THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1239.—VOL. XLIV. SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1864. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

LE JOUR DE L'AN.

THE complimentary visit of the Corps Diplomatique to the Emperor of the French on New-Year's Day is an occasion on which it has been customary for his Imperial Majesty to address a few words to Europe, and, to be appropriate, they must have reference to European interests. It is naturally taken for granted that the Sovereign who has the universal repute of being more able than any other on the Continent to convert his words into facts will have settled by careful premeditation both the matter and the form of the response he gives to the congratulations of the diplomatic body, and that not a syllable of it is dropped at random. Whatever shape it may assume—a characterisation of the past, a comment on the present, or a wish in regard to the future—is supposed to furnish a clue, more or less direct, to the purpose which, for the time being, is predominant in the mind of the speaker. The utterance, therefore, has come to assume in the public mind much of the significance which was anciently attributed to the oracle, and its tenour and terms are believed to indicate to Europe the probable direction in which her affairs will move for another year. Hence, le jour de l'an at Paris excites even more political than social interest, and every bourse between London and Constantinople, St. Petersburg and Athens, appreciates by a sympathetic movement the meaning of the Imperial speech.

Perhaps Napoleon III. is hardly more indebted to his enormous power or his political sagacity than to the heated imaginations of his neighbours for the intense expectation with which his ceremonious address is looked for. The master of so many armed legions, no doubt, could, if he were so disposed, agitate Europe from centre to circumference. But his disposition, like that of lesser men, must submit to the control of circumstances and possibilities. What he might determine to attempt if his choice were unfettered it is heedless to conjecture, the fact being that his will is under laws which his practical wisdom fears to disobey. On the whole, he has given reliable evidence to Europe that he regards the well-being of France, and, by consequence, the fortunes of the Bonaparte dynasty, as intimately connected with the well-being of surrounding Powers. Be his motives what they may, his policy, with occasional exceptions, has been one of moderation. His last great project, although unhappily a visionary one, indicated a pacific and generous purpose. His New-Year's Day deliverance (which will not have been given to the world until after this Journal has gone to press) has been already anticipated by the Emperor's speech to the Senate. We are warranted in taking for granted that the affairs of the year will not be thrown into confusion by any announcement likely to be made to the Corps Diplomatique. We shall assume, as we think we may do with safety, that we are already in possession of all the materials requisite for a fair judgment of the existing European situation, and, therefore, for a reasonable estimate of future probabilities. "Coming events," it is said, "cast their shadows before." It is in the careful study of what is that the most trustworthy glimpse may be had, if at all, of what is to be.

As it regards the United Kingdom, the New Year's prospects are, to say the least, hopeful. We have surmounted the most threatening of our domestic calamities—the cotton distress—and are justified by positive knowledge of supplies coming to hand, in believing that as the year advances the recovery of the manufacture will be more complete. Our general commercial position is sound, and trade promises to be active. To what extent it may be limited by that tightness of the money market which may be expected to follow large payments made for cotton in bullion, instead of in goods, is a question for the answer to which by facts many will, doubtless, look with considerable anxiety. Putting our faith in the laws of political economy, we have little dread of anything beyond a temporary pressure, more or less severe, which will be sure to have its compensations for the community at large. The expansion of our revenue, and perhaps the diminution of our expenditure, rendered exceptionally large during the last few years by defensive works, will, we trust, enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer once more to lighten the burden of taxation. There is nothing upon the surface indicating a likelihood of great political excitement; and, for the present, social ameliorations bid fair to take precedence of constitutional reforms. Should peace be preserved, the year 1864, so far as this country is concerned, will probably roll round quietly, and even prosperously. And it is matter for congratulation that all parties are intent upon preserving the peace, as well those who seek office as those who have it. The fairest prospects, we all know, are liable to be suddenly overclouded. For aught we can tell, the incident which will reverse all our anticipations may be occurring at this moment. But, subject to unforeseen accidents, everything discernible within the compass of 1864 wears to England the hue of promise, and, with less faltering of tone than usual, we may bid one another "A happy New Year!"

We fervently wish that the outlook from le jour de l'an were as flattering to Europe at large as to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in particular. The horoscope, however, cannot be pronounced favourable. The temper of the German people in relation to the Schleswig-Holstein Duchies is so fiery that it will be to the credit of the great Powers if they should succeed in preventing it from kindling a European conflagration. Even in case of the peaceable settlement of this feud between the Scandinavian and Teutonic races there is Poland still on fire, still scattering sparks upon all that is combustible in Europe; and, although France as well as England has come to the conclusion that an armed intervention on behalf of the Poles would serve no useful purpose, and that the only boon which Poland would accept is precisely that which Western Europe cannot give—a complete restitution of her ancient power and territory—yet it cannot be concealed that the exterminating policy of Russia is producing an exasperation of feeling among the nations with regard to her likely enough to take offence on some more manageable ground of dispute, and that incessant friction can have no more probable result than a sudden outburst of flame. Ugly rumours are astir, moreover, with regard to Austria's non-Germanic territories. Garibaldi has his eye upon Venetia. Kossuth is said to be using his voice heard in Hungary. The Christian races under the suzerainté of the Turk are showing signs of restlessness. Possibly, the effort made, and made in vain, by the Emperor Napoleon to revive the European pact with a view of reconciling the just rights of Sovereigns with the legitimate aspirations of peoples has awakened the latter to a new sense of their pain. In this as it may, there is writhing shrieks of a world-wide nationalities, which will increase rather than not the gravitation of Continental affairs towards war. The atmosphere has an unsettled look. Here and there scud is flying across the firmament in omens of evil betwixt the storms. There is but one auspicious sign. It is that all the great Powers are resolved to avert a general war if possible. In spite, however, of their known wishes and interests in this matter, A.D. 1864 opens doubtfully and with a tremulous aspect.

A glance across the Atlantic is but little calculated to raise our spirits. But for the singular inability of American affairs to take exactly the course which the world at large would like to see them will not take, we should found upon present appearances a confident prediction that the present year would not witness the termination of the sanguinary and gigantic struggle. Neither of the predictions which seemed to have arrived prepares us for the "consummation decently to be wished." Another spring, and summer, and autumn, we fear, are destined to witness in that western hemisphere the desolations which man can lay upon the face of a country and upon his fellowman. The only solace open to us is, that the shock of arms is destroying the life of slavery, and that the more the former is protracted the less chance there is for the ultimate escape of future generations of the latter.

After all, however, we can see obligation from the vantage ground of le jour de l'an much better than we can foresee events. What we ought to do, each one in his own peculiar character sphere, is about to happen. Yet, when we have tollingly surmounted the ridge of a long and perhaps wearisome ascent, it is natural that we should cast an eager look over the country on the other side, and scan, as well as we can, the course of its features. That done, we resume our march, giving due heed to the fitting duties of the hour. So it is with the journey of life, national as well as individual. There are occasions when we feel impelled to look back upon the past and the hazy distance of futurity. We fancy, perhaps, we can make out the general character of the region immediately ahead of us; but our forecasts seldom help us much, whether as men or as nations, in discovering the best road; and we find that a daily adaptation of our duties to our position is the surest and safest way to prosperity and renown.

"THE AGE OF INNOCENCE."

THE sole portraits of Sir Charles Eyrcsdale are, in dignity and character, sometimes inferior to those of Titian, and our English master does not always succeed in obtaining so much refinement as he would, and did not always succeed in obtaining so much refinement as he did the great Venetian. Nor did Sir Joshua equal the force, the magical truth, and effectiveness of chiaroscuro of Rembrandt, the handling, also, Reynolds was less brilliant and direct than Velasquez, Veronese, and Rubens. For true refinement, however, for finer grace, and beauty in female portraiture, Sir Joshua and Reynolds alone can, we think, be compared to Reynolds. And between Sir Joshua and Vandyke the balance of charity is not cast into freedom from anything approaching affectation is we opine, decidedly in favour of the Englishman. The fine, high-bred ease of children that Reynolds must be acknowledged supreme and unapproached. The two traits of childhood which Reynolds delighted to naturalness, charm, and variety which have never been equalled. Had Reynolds, instead of the old hackneyed "Infant Samuel," painted "Infant Jesus" in a dress children, all remarkable for their loveliness, Raimi in his action, spent half his life in the Academy Exhibition and, also like the Italian, spent half his life in the Academy Exhibition, the result, we think, and what not, he could not have been more happy in his various representations of them, and, judging from many anecdotes, could have been more happy in his life. Seattle and others have been testimony to Reynolds's fondness of children and the habit of observing them. Northcote tells us that "Life" that "it was one of Sir Joshua's favourite maxims that all the graces of children are graceful." And that the most delicate and unnatural attitude consonances with the introduction of the dancing-master. He delighted also in the natural and free movements even of infants." And then the pupil and biographer tells a story as illustrative of the engaging observation and the great patience with unbreakable to catch instruction wherever it was to be gained. Sir Joshua being in company at a house of rank and gentlemen who were viewing a nobleman's house, they passed through a gallery of portraits, when a little girl, who had been one of the party, observing the particular attention of Sir Joshua, by her vivacity and the sensible drollery of her observations; for whenever the company made a stand to look at any picture, she constantly, the child, unconscious of being observed by any one, imitated, by her actions, the air of the head, and countenance and action of the figure disposed position of the limbs in each picture; and this she did with so much awareness and true judgment, that Sir Joshua was much incontrovertible criticism that could be made on the picture.

Sir Joshua's preference for portraiture, and for the large proportion of his fancy pictures, in which children are introduced. Reynolds, for example, his famous "Children in a Storm," and "The Angels," there are in the long list of his works many infant "Seasons," there are in the long list of his works many infant Joysters, Beechnuts, and Cupids, Graces, and Muses, and "Shepherd's Girl," there are bearded-boys, and boys of every kind—even a "Chimney Boy" "Boy singing with a candle," "Boy with a bubble," "a dog," etc. The "girls" are equally numerous, and, besides the "Children in the Wood," there are "Girls at play," manner of designations. In our National Gallery (British School) there are several pictures of this class besides the charming "Age of Innocence," which we have engraved on the preceding page, and the transition of the series of engravings from the national pictures that we offer our readers from time to time. This "Age of Innocence" (bequeathed by Mr. Vernon) is neither more nor less felicitous than the painter's average pictures of child character. Like scores by him of similar kind, which might be named, its charm resides in its unobtrusive truth, its delicate feeling, and the graceful unconsciousness of the subject with the conception and execution. It is merely a little toddler, with hair combed only by a simple effect, and no trace of ornament or the mode about its careless white frock stuffing after its own infantine fashion on the green sward. Its hands folded in petty unconsciousness across its innocent bosom, looking at the silvery dewy light, as of dawn, along the horizon, with an expression of unruffled angelic purity and content. The chaste yet beautiful colour, the total absence of display in the execution, contribute to that perfect unison of simplicity and truth so aptly suggested by the title. We have said it is "merely" these and this is by far the highest praise we can bestow. We endeavoured to describe, neither more nor less—for being as far from affectation on the one hand and uninteresting power on the other, that its excellence is so rare and precious; and it is this which elevates the picture into the region of the best and highest art.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

As usual at this season, the bustle of politics has been superseded in a great measure by the bustle of preparation necessary to the approach of what it is at once the first and greatest day of the year to Parisians—the 1st of January.

The sitting of the Corps Législatif on Thursday week was remarkable for the inauguration of the new Tribune in the semicircular centre. A Paris correspondent of a daily paper says:—"M. Thiers stood up to speak when the Tribune was ready, and a profound silence had really no existence, and as if it were but yesterday, instead of twelve long years, he stood in a place where he was resigned all his supremacy. The subject was one with which he is well acquainted, and had but an indirect relation to politics. He had, in company with several other members, to propose that the report of the Finance Committee on M. Fould's loan, and which proposed limiting to 100 millions the amount of the loan, should be put off. We have seen in his speech, as given in the Moniteur, that M. Thiers supported his motion with the customary clearness and even remarkable; and, moreover, that he was listened to from the beginning to the end with the greatest attention. It was heard in the utmost respect. The object for pressing this amendment was less one of peace or war than of internal economy. In case the representatives of the people should exercise a real influence in the management and disbursement of the revenue. The sum was large, but it was not enormous, and one hardly be said to be beaten, for he obtained from those who represented the Government a pledge that on the 1st of January, 1865, the loan of 100 millions, or to that which he demanded should be introduced. M. Thiers supported his motion with the argument that the budget of 1865 which the Government would be greatly puzzled to reject, absolutely. The budget of 1865 will be the first one which will be voted. The stroke was parried, it was because the Government promised to do so in distant future. M. Thiers, however, was not satisfactorily. The Chamber rejected the amendment, but accepted its principle, and allowed the budget of 1865 to be voted before the loan was put in out. M. Vuitry, Vice-President of the Council of State, who spoke on behalf of the Government, declared that in accord with this answer, the intervention of M. Thiers's speech was remarked by every one. He spoke with great self-command and nothing, he provoked the slightest murmur. He pronounced anything which would excite the passions or the prejudices of any party."

M. Guizot, the leader of the Left Opposition, explained their reasons for not voting for the amendment of M. Thiers. M. Olivier spoke in favour of it, but he himself declared he should declined to be a public character. M. Olivier's speech was greatly cheered by his friends.

The Loan Bill was finally adopted by 249 against 14 votes. M. Thiers's amendment was then put to the vote and was lost, and did not vote at all. M. Berryer also abstained.

The three new elections for Paris, Marseilles, and the departments of the Seine-Inférieure, the Gard, and the Vosges have been fixed for the 17th and 18th inst.

The Council of rendering public the discussions in the Senate.

A report of Marshal Randon, approved by the Emperor, relieves from their engagements the soldiers who have served seven years.

The French Academy has decided that the reception of M. de Carné, who replaces M. Biot, shall take place on the third Thursday in January next. M. de Carné will succeed M. Ancelot, the Academy's wake after.

The Academy of Sciences has held its annual sitting at the Institute—M. Velpeau presiding. An historical eulogium of Audot Dumeril was read by M. Flourens. The prize proposed for the best work on the life and works of Kepler by M. Bertrand. The grand prize for mathematics was given to M. Lamarmora, of M. 1861, prizes for mathematics were given to M. Lamarmora, of M. 1861, and Hess, and that for 1863, were not awarded, but an encouragement of 1000f. was given to the widow of one pupil, and the Steel Medal of the Academy was awarded to M. Edouard Desains, author of a paper on capillary attraction. The prize for experimental physics was given to M. Quet, and that for anatomy and surgery the Academy awarded to M. Chassaignac a prize of 2500f., and to M. Follin one of 1500f. M. Gaudin on botanical researches mention, with 1500f. for each. A prize of 2500f. was given to M. Jamin, and that for 1863 was left over. The prize for "Rural and Rural Habitations," a prize of 2000f. to M. Guignet for the preparation of a new green colour. The prize for "Statistics" of M. 1864, encouragement of 1500f. to M. Bouffe, for having discovered a substitute for arsenical green in the manufacture of coloured papers. The Cuvier prize was awarded to Sir Roderick Murchison, correspondent of the section of Geology and Mineralogy.

SPAIN.

News from Vera Cruz to the 2nd ult. has been received at Paris. The report of General Prim's arrival at Orizaba, on his way to Mexico, was premature. He was marching towards the Pacific. Another corps is likewise on the same march towards the Pacific. Admiral Bosse is marching upon San Luis. Soles and Ouanchez have joined their posts as members of the Mexican Regie commands at the city of Mexico. The French troops will shortly evacuate Vera Cruz, and the Spanish troops will embark at the same time. Vera Cruzia Cabrera actually conquered. M. De Saligni is about to return to France by Cuyer.

The address in reply to the speech from the Throne has been adopted in Congress by 141 against 75 votes.

ITALY

The Pope, on receiving the usual Christmas congratulations of the Cardinals, delivered an allocution in reply. His Holiness dealt much at length with the encroachments of the Governments of the Papacy during the sovereignty of Pius IX., and expressed his conviction that the Church would come out victorious. The following facts have been stated—the Pope is also reported to have said that he expected serious events in the coming year, but that he was satisfied that the Church would come off victorious.

The Italian Government has officially announced that it will not give its exequatur to the Bishops lately appointed by the Pope to sundry sees in the Romagna, as those appointments have been made in virtue of a claim of sovereignty, and not as an act of purely spiritual authority.

Garibaldi has sent in his resignation as Deputy to the Italian Parliament. A letter recently written by Menotti Garibaldi contains the following:—"My father's health is excellent; he walks about the island with his cane only, and hopes to be able to join you next spring to take part in the last battles for our independence."

THE SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN QUESTION.

The King of Sweden has received the Prince of Augustenburg with all the honours due to a Sovereign Prince. At Gotha, on Monday, his prospective Majesty received an official deputation from the University of Kiel, consisting of the Deans and some of the Professors, who were the bearers of an address of allegiance from the Academical Consistory. The Prince has announced to the European Governments his succession to the throne of Schleswig-Holstein."

A letter has been written by the Prince to the Emperor Napoleon, and conveyed to him by a Prince Reuss, an officer in the Prussian army. It is said that the Envoy was well received, but in a private capacity only, at Compiegne. The Emperor has sent a written answer to Prince Reuss, in which he declares himself friendly between the traditional sympathies of France for the Danish monarchy and his respect for the principle of nationality, to which he owes himself opposed in the north of Europe, after having combated for it in the south.

The federal execution in Holstein has at length taken place. On Thursday morning the Saxon contingent entered Altona, and as the Germans marched into the town the Danes marched out of it. No sooner had the Danish troops left than the people of the Holstein capital gave full vent to their Teutonic sympathies. The disappearance of the Danish troops was the signal for a display for the instant display of German emblems, and before King Christian's troops had been an hour out of the city Altona was covered with Schleswig-Holstein colours. An account of the day's proceedings of the inhabitants was held, and Prince Frederick of Augustenburg was declared by the legislative assembly of the country. The Federal Commissioners offered no opposition to this proceeding, and the band of the Saxon contingent played the national air of Schleswig-Holstein. The magistrates and other principal inhabitants address to Prince Frederick.

The Prince has been proclaimed by Neustadt, Braunstedt, and Murse; and still Holstein continues to declare its fealty to the Federal Diet and refused to proceed north. The Hanoverians now occupy Altona in place of the Saxons, who have left Kiel.

Prince Frederick arrived at Kiel on Wednesday, and is said to have been received with great enthusiasm. The new Government of Holstein has been formed, and the Danish troops fall quietly back.

A proclamation of the Federal Commissioners has been published, expressing their satisfaction at the feeling shown by the prudent measures on the part of the people, and especially against any act antagonizing the decision of the Diet, and by proclaiming the Prince of Augustenburg. The federal Commissioners further pronounce against any attempt to establish a provisional Government. The people be strictly obey their previous proclamation. No objection will be made to expressions of joy for the Prince's accession of Augustenburg.

A popular meeting held at Elmshorn, attended by about 20,000 persons, was held on Sunday, and was addressed by Count Reventlow, the following address to the Prince of Augustenburg :—" As far as the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein are concerned by the Danish subjects Schleswig-Holstein has been evacuated by the Danish troops. Assembled in this meeting, Your Highness has been solemnly proclaimed by the Schleswig-Holsteiners here assembled as legitimate Sovereign Prince of the Schleswig-Holstein. If Your Highness sacrifices it may cost, the country will make them. Herr Metz from Darmstadt has arrived at the Frankfort Conference, and one of the National Association that the German nation will support Schleswig-Holstein with all its power."

At an extraordinary sitting of the Federal Diet, on Monday, the representative of Austria formally waived the question of the succession of Schleswig, to ensure the rights of the German Confederacy. A motion was then carried that the Federal troops should be ordered to withdraw the ordinances referring to the incorporation of Schleswig with Denmark, and that the Diet should be left free to act as it might deem expedient. It was also that the Military Committee should take into its consideration the more detailed military measures to be taken in consideration the requisite measures to be committees on the Danish question.

The English note was read and referred to the committee upon Holstein affairs. The note officially communicates to the Confederation the fact of the accession of the King of the Hellenes. It adds, that if, by overhasty measures, the Confederation departs from the course therein indicated, it will be more complications and more England is, however, ready to take part in a conference, at which representatives of the Great Powers and Sweden and Norway should sign the treaty.

The communication of the German representative bodies assembled at Frankfort have issued an appeal to the German nation on the Schleswig-Holstein question, and the people are called upon to send respective Governments in favour of the Prince of Augustenburg, and to exhorting them to provide money and men for the purpose of holding the duchies.

The Danish Ministry has tendered their resignation, which was accepted by the King. It is not said they will remain in office. On Saturday the members of the Cabinet and several eminent statesmen had a long and important political meeting at the Rigshaad, and an interview with the King. They were all unanimous that a legal solution of the Schleswig-Holstein question is impossible. The reasons stated were that, wherever the federal troops have entered, they have proclaimed the succession and the protection. Which King Christian has been deprived of his rights as Duke of Holstein, the succession to which has been abandoned, and any opposition is loyalty suppressed, all in the presence of the federal troops. The principal ex clergyman in King Christian.

The resignation of the Ministers of Austria and Prussia have been declined by the Emperor and King, and they remain members of the Diplomatic Corps. The Ministers have, nevertheless, declared that they have no longer the confidence of reports which received from their Governments, but remain as private persons. The same step is said to have been taken by the Ministers of Bavaria, Saxony, Hanover, and Berlin.

It is reported in Copenhagen that England has proposed that a conference shall be held in Paris of the Powers which signed the London Treaty of 1852, in order to arrange the succession to the Germanic Diet, to discuss the succession question and that of the common Danish Monarchy.

The Dagbladet of Copenhagen has a terribly warlike article on the Schleswig-Holstein question, and declares that Denmark is ready to fight to the last man, and to a cloak for conquest, and as a revolution is being effected under the protection of the Federal troops, and is now demanding nothing short of the complete severance of the duchies from Denmark, the latter Power has no alternative but to have recourse to arms. The writer says that England will not allow it to be ground that these Powers demand the withdrawal of the common Constitution, and the separation of Holstein and Slesvig. If, however, Russia are charged with brutality. The latter is taunted with whose Poland, and the writer concludes by exhorting Scandinavians to arms in 1863.

We intend to give in our next Number a Portrait of the Prince of Augustenburg; also several Illustrations of the occupation of Altona by the federal troops.]

PRUSSIA.

It is said that the Crown Prince is amongst those who take a decided interest in the Danish question, that the King is also more than half inclined to renounce the Treaty of London, and that many influences of the Prussian Court, and the want of money, by which the Chamber of Deputies have indirectly expressed their willingness to grant the necessary funds for the war. A deputation was appointed by the Chamber of Deputies to present the address of the House to the King, and to express their wish that the Ministers should be the King declined to receive the document except through the Minister. A written reply was made by the King on Sunday. It announces that the Federal Diet, in co-operation with Prussia, has reserved its decision on the question of hereditary succession in Holstein : and that withdrawal on the part of Prussia from the London Treaty "would not be feasible without further consideration. The King wishes the Chamber to vote the loan at an early date.

AUSTRIA.

French and Italian papers concur in reporting considerable excitement in the southern provinces of the empire.

The Allienza of Milan states th at an insurrectionary manifesto has been affixed in the principal towns of Hungary, announcing the establishment of a general committee to obtain the independence of Hungary, and declaring "has assumed the direction of the affairs of the country, under the orders of Kossuth." The Austrian Government, it is added, is taking great precautions, but agitation is general throughout Hungary.

The Indépendance Belge says that the manifesto emanated directly from Kossuth, and adds that the committee has been organised on the same footing as the secret Polish Government.

Considerable progress seems to have been determined upon by the Government, in view of the threatening aspect of circumstances. The Vienna Presse says:—"We learn from Pesth that the Hungarian Ministry has decided to renew its efforts to carry out the Constitution in Hungary and that it has come to a determination to carry out the elections, and to proceed with some fresh elections, which would be preceded by a preliminary reorganisation of the counties. The Acts of the Diet relative to Hungary has already opened negotiations with the notables of the country. The project of first convoking the Croatian Diet is said to have been abandoned, and their Majesties will, it is stated, make a tour in Hungary in the month of February next."

THE INSURRECTION IN POLAND.

A few engagements are still reported in Poland. The insurgent leader, Chmielinski, has been surprised and defeated by the Russians. Capture has also fallen to the lot of the Abbé Machiewicz, one of the earliest of the chiefs engaged in the movement. He had fought at the head of a band of peasants near the Austrian frontier, and in the insurrection, and the Invalide Russe itself admits that he has been engaged in no less than thirty battles. He has been brought before a court-martial, and the result of his trial is only too certain.

Advices from Warsaw state that numerous arrests were made in that city on Christmas Day. The agents of General Berg in that city have commenced enforcing the signature of addresses expressing loyalty to the Czar. The first addresses submitted to the inhabitants for signature were taken round in a friendly manner on the 19th inst. Mgr. Feierwak, the substitute of Archbishop Felinski, was required by an agent of the Government to sign one of the latter recommending the signature of the addresses; but he refused to comply.

Letters from the government of Gosdno give a terrible description of the persecution of the military commissions under the direction of Baron Colonel Bouyeon. This officer, who is fanatically attached to the Greek religion, has offered the political prisoners their lives on condition of gratuitously if they consented to change their faith. In the little prison of the town there are no less than 240 persons, 200 of whom are women. There unfortunate people are half starved, many of them are forced to sleep in the courtyard in the midst of the snow for want of room in the building, and all are beaten with sticks at the frequent examinations yet all but two refused to change their religion.

AMERICA.

WAR INTELLIGENCE.

We have news from New York to the morning of the 19th inst. The intelligence respecting the Mexican question may be briefly summarised.

General Escobedo, who does not appear to have been retreating with any hot haste from Knoxville, turned upon the pursuing Federals, as the 14th and drove them back with considerable and unexpected loss. The latest accounts were to the effect that fighting was still going on at what is described as Bull's Gap, Tennessee.

The Federals are said to have abandoned Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, and other points, from which General Grant recently drove the Confederates.

Hardee's army is estimated at 35,000 strong, and is at Dalton, with pickets extending to the tunnel. The Federals are concentrating at Dalton for an active winter campaign. Grant and Sherman have left Chattanooga for the Rappahannock.

The famous Confederate guerrilla leader, Morgan, who recently made his escape from a Federal prison, is said to be in considerable loss. The latest accounts were to the effect that fighting was still going on at what is described as Bull's Gap, Tennessee.

There is no news of importance from the army of the Potomac. Meeby's and White's guerrillas are very troublesome and numerous, continually harassing the outposts. On the 11th the Federals recaptured a dash at the enemy's pickets at Bun, near Catlett's station, but were driven back by the force guarding the bridge. The line of the railroad from this point to Alexandria is said to be well and protected by both cavalry and infantry. Short leaves of absence are freely granted to officers and men for the purpose of family in relation to the removal of General Meade. It is reported that he has demanded a court of inquiry into the charges made by Congressman.

General Stuart, at the head of a force of Confederate cavalry, has made a raid upon the Orange and Alexandria railway near Fairfax, and, besides capturing a number of prisoners, he destroyed about two miles of the track of railway.

A despatch from General Butler at Fortress Monroe announces that a portion of his force, under General Weitzel, has succeeded in capturing the Confederate garrison at Charles City crossroads on the James River. Eight officers and over eighty Confederate soldiers were taken. The Federal forces, it is stated, have also taken seventy-two miles in fifty-four hours mostly in a severe storm.

A telegram of the 16th announces the destruction of the Blockade City, North Carolina, on the 10th of December. The inhabitants were entirely taken by surprise, and the Federal troops found "twenty waggon-loads of confiscated goods were sent back to Portsmouth by the General in charge." It is said that Blockade City was a place of great importance.

The Federals were throwing a large number of shells into Charleston; replied to by the Confederate batteries. An accidental fire had broken out in the Stanton, killing ten and injuring thirty men. A storm had so seriously injured the obstructions to the entrance to the harbour that it was thought the Federal fleet would be able to make its way through them.

THE IRONCLADS.

The official reports of the commanders of the monitors engaged in Dupont's attack on Charleston express disappointment at their inability to overcome strong forts, and the fact that the vessel had been prolonged the monitors would all have been disabled. One commander says he was disappointed in the penetrating power of the armament of monitors overcoming strong forts, and considers it was a fair trial.

Captain Drayton, of the Passive, says :—

I was struck in quick succession in the lower part of the turret by two heavy shots which lodged in the plates and started the bolts throughout the rails on which the carriage of the 11-inch gun worked, rendered it wholly unfit for service. Shortly after, at 3.50 P.M., a shot struck the top of the turret, and, passing through the iron plating and the heavy timber, struck the pilot-house with such force as to send it over upon the deck, and rupture not the upper but the lower plates of the turret, and rendering it extremely likely that the next shot would take off the top entirely.

Captain Rodgers, of the Weehawken, reports :—

Two or three shots struck and glanced off from the nose plate. They so broke the iron that it only remained in splintered fragments, much of which could be picked off by hand, and the wood backing exposed. A shot was pierced so as to make a hole, through which water ran into the vessel; thirty-six bolts were broken in the turret, and a number in the pilot-house. To the Patapsco no damage was done which disabled her, although injuries within the received, if unrepaired, would in a few days render the turret were broken. After the third shot from the 10-inch gun of the Vanderbilt struck the pilot-house the armour-plates were found to be loose and were soon driving in the grating. It was not until again. A number of the nose plates were broken off, and the bolts were driven in and the heads of the bolts were broken off. The nine bolts were cut in two and the heads driven into the room, and about two inches into the beam, starting the plates, several bolts, and the planking, for some feet below. The plates on the side armour of the Nahant were badly broken in several places, and one, where struck by two shots in close proximity, partly stripped from the wood, and the wood backing broken in, with edging of back plates started up and rolled back in places. The shot was struck twice damagingly, one shot near the propeller-wheel quite shattering and tearing the plate in its passage, and starting up twenty-five bolts, and the other shot struck near the bow, and broke off the head and shank of one shot. Fifty-six of the bolts were broken perceptibly, the heads flying off inside the turret, and the bolts starting almost their length outside, some of them flying out completely, and being found at a considerable distance from the turret, on the deck. One shot struck the upper part of the turret, breaking through every plate. The plates and bolts were generally much wrecked, and four more such shots as it received would have demolished it, One shot at the bun broke every plate through, and evidently nearly penetrated it.

At the back of the Engraving of the Waikato village and church is represented a portion of the Heads, which begin at the mouth of the river. The settler's house depicted in the other Illustration is situated by the side of the Heads, not a great distance from the Waikato church.

The Gazette of Tuesday week contains a series of despatches, dated the 5th of October last, received by the Secretary of State for War from Lieutenant-General D. A. Cameron, C.B., commanding her Majesty's forces in New Zealand. They state that the forces occupied nearly the same position as at the date of the last despatch. The advance was delayed until the gun-boats and steamers were available. The enemy has, in the mean time, taken the opportunity of practising his favourite mode of warfare by forming marauding bands, plundering the scattered settlements in the bush, and murdering individuals. This, in such a country as New Zealand, it is impossible wholly to prevent. It has, however, led to several skirmishes, reflecting the highest credit on the officers and men engaged, who have invariably fought with great gallantry and intelligence; and in every instance, except the conflict at Cameron Town (where a small detachment was suddenly exposed, in a most unfavourable position, to the fire of overwhelming numbers), they inflicted a much severer loss on the enemy than they had themselves sustained. The officers in command, many of them young and most of them untried, have one and all merited approbation. The efforts to raise volunteers in this and the neighbouring colonies for general service during the war, on condition of obtaining grants of land, have been most successful. About one half of them are drilled and fit for service at the outposts, and the remainder are being rapidly trained. Several additional troops have arrived from Melbourne and Hobart Town.

GROUP OF THE BENGAL NEW POLICE.

On the preceding page we give an Engraving, from a photograph kindly placed at our disposal, of a group of the new police which is being organised in Bengal. The group consists of the district Superintendent, two Inspectors, a head constable, a constable, and a sowar. The central seated figure is Lieutenant Bowie, of the Madras Staff Corps, the officer commanding the force. At his right sits Inspector Harry Mullick, a pure Bengalee. He is a shrewd, intelligent, and active man. He reads and writes English fluently, and has a good knowledge of Persian and Hindoo. He is a good rider, a capital shot, and is, altogether, an excellent specimen of "Young Bengal." Seated at the left hand of Lieutenant Bowie is Inspector Pandy, formerly a subadar in the 4th Oude Police Battalion. He is a particularly smart and intelligent man, is a first-rate drill, and has a great talent for command—qualifications which make him particularly useful in a semi-military force. Of the figures at the back, the one at the right of the spectator is an Afghan sowar, who is chiefly remarkable for his size and his long boots. The two others are Sikhs from Lahore, who did right good service during the mutiny.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1864.

THIS last topic upon the lips and in the hearts of all, as the old year sank to its rest, was the loss of a great and a good man, William Makepeace Thackeray.

The blow has fallen with a strange suddenness. Thackeray eminently a man of social life, was among his friends and at his clubs, and full in the midst of as many who knew him, and it seemed as if hands were still warm from his last friendly grasp, when it was announced that his hand was cold for ever. No such shock has come upon the households which he helped to people with his creations, and there probably has been no mourning has been that a nation has lost valuable servants, or that art or science was the poorer by the death of a successful labourer in her field. But he who is gone was one of us. Not only was he known to all, but his fellow-citizens dwellers in our houses, not only was his wisdom the talk at our tables, but he lived with and among us, and thousands who never interchanged a word with him seemed to regard him as a friend, and to feel that the sympathy of his nature penetrated into circles far beyond those of personal acquaintanceship. Men and women who had, perhaps, once seen the towering figure and noble head, with its silvery hair, or have, perhaps, seen him at all, and were not present on Wednesday, almost as sadly as the friends who had the honour and happiness of calling him friend.

We have no intention of attempting here, a history of his private or literary life, or an estimate of the place he will hold in the ranks of English genius. A successful author's life seldom presents many features for narrative. From the moment when his mark is made, and he has found the way to lead the better for himself and the world, and the worse for a biographer. It must, however, never be forgotten that Thackeray—in his maturer years the brilliant, popular, and prosperous man—made his own position as much as did any of the self-made heroes whom the world, to its honour and profit, is now learning to revere. Nay, he did more than most of such men, for he had not in early life had occasion to pick up his loins for the struggle of life, but was at full vigour when he entered the field to another arm that than in which he learned to excel. It is no secret that a change in his fortunes caused him to address himself to the pen, and it would be known, for the encouragement of others, should they ever be driven to so apparently adverse fate, that Thackeray began his literary career at a low rung on the ladder. He laboured anonymously in the Press, and in the service of publishers, through he fought with visor down, there was no mistaking the glitter of the steel or the force of the blow. Thackeray's was not a mind that could long be at work without the world's perceiving that a strong mind was at work, and fame, reputation, and then prosperity. But both were the mere rewards of determined resolution. There were no patrons to talk in society about the excessively clever young man until society was talked into noticing the young man; there was no powerful friend to bear costs and charges of publication, and give the new man a fairer chance than his fellows; and there was no mauvaise honte to force him upon the world by that organised system of puffing which is the curse of literature. His work is not entirely unknown here. Thackeray made his way to the front by the sheer and unaided strength of his own intellect.

That having been said, we would not dwell longer upon his literary fame than we must. We well could for, inasmuch as every literary man of character will, sooner or later, pen his testimony to the genius of the departed. But let us add that, as in the case of Sir Walter, the personal character of the man have added to ecdeer him to us all. The high moral nature, the ever-ready charity, the gentlemanly bearing of William Thackeray, are matters within the knowledge of thousands, and profession that a thorough gentleman was the head of the great author was a good man. You cannot, if you would, keep the light of a true man's private life from the public eye. The authors of England—the journalists the was long a newspaper writer—have granted a tribute to his memory which has been promptly borne by those who had best means of knowing his power)—were all proud of him, and justly proud. He was one of their noblest representatives; and it is to their credit and profession that a thoroughly gentleman, who lived by it, and took pride in it, and adorned it, should fill a grand place in the view of the world. The list of those who came to stand with bare heads and wet eyes while the earth fell upon his coffin will testify to the love and reverence felt for him by those who labour with the brain. There are never been such a gathering in our time as stood in the rays of that winter sun to hear the solemn words pronounced over the grave of what but a few days before had been William Makepeace Thackeray.

We have lost one of our greatest men, and the chill is upon the heart of the nation as we pass into the New Year. His best monument is his matchless books. But England must satisfy her own heart, though she cannot add to his fame, by erecting a memorial that shall tell posterity how we honoured him. We must give him a statue. And it should surely stand among the monuments of those to so many of whom, and to their age, he gave a fresh vitality, and a living significance for us who had wellnigh let them and their time go out of account and be forgotten. In that part of the Abbey where rest the bones, or where are seen the honorary memorials, of the intellectual dead of other days, should be reared a statue of the great and good man, who has himself been laid, with touching and filial deference to the simpleness and affectionateness of his nature, in the humble suburban burial-place—henceforth a place of pilgrimage.

THE REVENUE RETURNS.—We have every reason to anticipate that the revenue returns for the year and account will be made up to-night, will show results in every way satisfactory. We need not say that, owing to the abolition of the duty on fire insurances, we have no expect to find an actual decrease upon those returns, as compared with those of last year, but we may reasonably expect and may examine the Board of Trade returns to come to the conclusion that the actual loss on tea is much less than that which Mr. Gladstone estimated when making his original financial statement. The consumption of tea has exceeded his expectations by many millions of pounds, and the duty has been paid upon a much larger quantity than was anticipated. Then, with regard to the property tax, we have little doubt that the actual falling off will be less than what might have been expected, even with the reduction of sixpence in the pound, upon which the general prosperity. The same cause more immediately affects the revenue under the head of excise, and we may be expected in consequence to show a very substantial increase. The other items of revenue are not likely to show any changes calling for remark. The general impression is that the revenue will turn with regard to the three important items, the customs (as affected by tea), excise, and property tax, and that the entire, we may suppose that where there has been reduction of taxation the actual loss of revenue is less than could be fairly anticipated, and where there has been, as in the case of the tea increase, the actual increase has exceeded that which was estimated. The general result will be, we have no doubt—Good.—Court Circular.

WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.—While generous tributes are everywhere paid to the memory of the great writer whose death fell in the fulness of his power and the maturity of his fame, and while the literary world mourns the loss of one of its chief ornaments, there is another world which has lost a friend, and has lost a dear friend. In every period in the history of this periodical he became a contributor to its pages, and he long continued to be one of its chief supports. He was also one of the few other old than suggestions and advice, he was a constant member of our council, and not with us at the meetings only from that which united England's Christmas. Let the brilliancy of his trained intellect, the terrible strength of his satire, the pathos of his tears, and the humour of his smile, and the eathetic range of his calm wisdom, be themes for others: the mourning friends who have gathered round his hearth and his table, and the thousands of friends who have gathered round his hearth and his table, and the thousands of friends who have gathered round his hearth and his table, and the thousands of

The Rev. W. Keane, Vicar of Whitby, was recently called upon to read the service over the body of a man who was found drowning whilst in a state of drunkenness. Mr. Keane refused to read the service, on the ground that he could not apply the words of hope to such a man who died whilst intoxicated. The matter was, therefore, referred to the Archbishop of York, who, in a letter of reprimand Dr. Keane, thus sets down his views on the question:—"The language of the burial service is that of hope, and it is the duty of the minister to read the service over the remains of persons in the belief that they died in the peace of God, and that no minister is required nor justified, even to the extent of a hair's breadth, in the act of injection, in passing a judgment on the state of any man. The Church discipline touches its functions to commence after death, and if a pastor has not admonished, rebuked, and exhorted the parishioner during his life, he has failed utterly in the subject of his besetting sin, he would seem to be precluded from using the terms of condemnation against him after death, which he might justly if he longer serve as a warning."

THE EDUCATIONAL COMMISSION.—This Commission was founded, so far as the augmentation of benefices is concerned, in 1840, and the means which would appear to be chiefly relied on for the purpose are the proceeds at £134,165 a year. The grants made by the Commission, either in the form of capital or of income, up to the present time amount to £460,000 a year in perpetuity. On its foundation grants to the amount of £30,000 a year were made, chiefly for the augmentation of small and populous districts; and in 1841 further grants of £50,000 a year were applied to the formation of "Queen Anne's Bounty for Dissenters," to the amount of £350 a year, in the manufacturing and populous parishes. Between 1840 and 1850 other grants, amounting to £60,000 a year, were made for new parish churches; and for parsonage-houses and other purposes; so that at the close of 1850 the grants of the Commission amounted to £460,000 a year in perpetuity. In 1850 the Commission was empowered to transfer to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners the property vested in the Commission; and in 1851 Parliament decided the principle of the transfer, and proceeded to investigate the improved value which might be obtained from the property of the ecclesiastical and collegiate corporations, and the amount of revenue derivable from the system of taking fines on the renewal of leases. In 1851 the Commission received 28 grants, and in 1852 the number increased to twenty-nine of £4000, £19,000, £57,000, £60,000, £64,000, and £160,000 have been granted. The total number of benefices at present is 10,941, and in 1851 and 1852 grants of income amounting to £40,000 a year in perpetuity have been made. The Commissioners have also the power of making grants for the erection of churches in the poorer districts of the large towns. During the same period grants equivalent to about £10,000 a year have also been made in respect of property held by the Crown in the metropolitan possession. In the whole, the grants of capital and income from 1840 to 1854 are equivalent to a permanent income of £1,000,000 a year in perpetuity. According to a recent speech of the Bishop of London, at Islington, the amount of all things considered, the net value of the whole of 8000 princes are to be raised immediately to £200 a year, and the present amount of augmentation will be distributed over a period of 15 ultimately declined. The Commission has been under the peculiar care of the Bishop of London, and the Commissioners have been appointed since 1847 to 1856. Bishop Blomfield's term has been extended from 1856 to 1866. Estates Commissioner are at present the Earl of Chichester, the Right Hon. R. P. Beaumont, the Right Hon. E. Wilmot, and the Archdeacon of Middlesex (ex officio mentioned) the Bishop of Winchester as episcopal member.

THE UNIVERSITIES AND PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The Election of Lord Rector of Aberdeen University took place on Thursday week with the following result:—Mr. Gladstone, 753 votes; Mr. Disraeli, 581 votes. The Election had had a majority in the several nations as well as by vote. His Lordship has announced his intention of going to Aberdeen to be installed in April, to be installed into office.

The Bishop of Lincoln presided on Tuesday week at the speeches and distribution of prizes at the Colchester Grammar School. In the course of the proceedings it was announced that for the present year the Rev. Dr. Wright, the Rev. Dr. Wright, had lost the first prize by one and two marks respectively; upon which the Bishop immediately presented to each of the two gentlemen a copy of Divinity prize to be contended for at Midsummer.

At the Annual Meeting of the Old Boys of Bishop Farnham Grammar School, Chairman, Mr. Wilkinson, delivered the prizes, and after the compliments of the Bishop of Winchester on having gained the certificate of honour, and the distribution of the prizes, Mr. Wilkinson said:

GREAT STORM ON THE DUTCH COAST.—During the last week or so the Dutch and neighbouring coasts have been visited by a very severe storm, which has done much damage. On the 19th ult. the wind began increase in violence, and by noon had reached a hurricane. The storm was accompanied by rain, and which arrived on Tuesday, is the greatest loss of her kind experienced for many years. Search has been dispatched in search of the missing trawling-smacks from the Humber. It is reported that the Lynx has been lost with all hands on board that Mr. Byrne, the engineer, was drowned—the rest of the crew being saved. At the request of the Board of Trade the Lords of the Admiralty have placed the former Hudson, lying at Sheerness, to proceed with all dispatch to the mouth of the Texel, and to the bays of Zuyder Zee and Dollart. Many vessels and riggings had been shattered of the seven or eight misstay trawling-smacks except that the crew of the Lynx had been saved. Among the wrecks is that of the vessel, Richard and Harry, of Leith, and Kingston, of Hull, have been totally destroyed. The crew of the latter vessel were saved by the pilot-boat. Steamers are reported to have been ashore. The Prussian steamer, Kronprinz Louise, screw steam-ship, which was on a voyage from Hamburg to Rotterdam, like the Willemsstad, encountered the storm, and foundered. The passengers were three or four miles off from the island. A large Swedish ship, called the Somerset, from Brindisi, which was bound for Rotterdam, with fruit, Gothenburg, was lost near the land, and, with the exception of two or three, the whole of her crew perished. The ship Margretta, bound to Leith, from the Tyne, stranded, and then sank, off Hardinger, and of those on board only the pilot and a boy are stated to have been saved. A fine fleet of vessels wrecked has been noted, and in several instances the crews are reported to have perished. The Dutch steamer Amsterdam, from Java, with a cargo of Bishop-beds belonging to that port were lost, five of them with their entire crews, numbering in all about thirty men.

Two of the Peninsular and Oriental steamers have met with accidents. The Bengasee, in her passage from Gibraltar to Suez, stranded near Adra on the 16th inst., and by the last accounts was in a very critical position. The Ripon, which left Southampton on the 17th ult. for Alexandria and Port Said, has likewise met with the misfortune of running on shore near the latter harbour; but the passengers and mails would be taken on by the Donaro.

INDOOR AMUSEMENTS.

The silence of optics affords an infinite variety of indoor amusements, which cannot fail to prove both instructive and entertaining. By the aid of optical instruments the astronomer is enabled to view the wonders of the starry heavens, and to detect the most minute parts of the smallest insect. Our present aim, however, will not be to enter into these scientific purposes; we will content ourselves with calling the attention of our readers to that ingenious invention, the magic lantern, as calculated to afford a much gratification to the young, middle-aged, and children of a larger growth. If properly managed, and carefully attended as we shall proceed to show, with proper illustrations. No sooner is the room darkened and the screen prepared than an experienced pianist should commence a needful overture, including all the popular music of the day; and if a gentleman can sing upon the while well, appropriate airs should be played, or prose or verse should be recited by some one behind the screen. The first subject, a ship in a storm, representing, first, a calm—air, "Peaceful, slumbering on the ocean," afterwards a small agitation—air, "Rocked in the cradle;" next, a tempest—air, "The Storm." Double effect would be produced by a party of cockatels singing one of Sankey's comic melodies—air, "Johnny Gilpin's ride to Edmonton," with the critics's progress recited; the witch's dance in "Macbeth," with Locke's extraordinary music; a stag-hunt—air, "This day a stag must die," a short scene from "The Ingoldsby Legends," or "Manfred," with its spirit-scenes and haunt of the "Hall of Arimanes;" Hudson and Mother Bunch," with the usual pantomimic airs, including all the regnisant music of the day, such as "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay," "Tippitywitchet," and "Hot Collins" song, will contribute largely to the entertainment of a party of young people and children. "Les Cochon Chinoises" will also furnish a fund of amusement, especially when dialogues are kept up with the orchestral aid. To render them perfect, the scenes ought to be rehearsed with as much care as if dramatic performances was about to be attempted. Legerdemain—including simple deceptions, feats requiring special apparatus, and tricks with cards—is most admirably adapted to wile away a winter evening, especially when the "Hall" is large, and we have studied under some professor of the magic art.

Cards play many favourite amusements, and during the reign of Charles II., as may be gleaned from Pepys's Diary, and a few extracts from that entertaining work may not be out of place here on the subject of Indoor Amusements. The worthy secretary thus writes:—"Jan. 13, 1663—My Lord Wright, who is now in town, is also teaching us to play at gleeke, which is a pretty game." At a later period Pepys gives alludes to playing at cards for money, instead of expensive cake, the most he ever won in his life: adding a prayer, that it would be well for every young man never to play for stakes he plays for, to offer up, "I pray it may not tempt me to play again for money." It appears that gleeke, which is, in fitness, a game of cards played by three persons, each hand having twelve cards, and the rest being left for the stock. It is again alluded to in "Life of Colonel Hutchinson," by his wife: "Whatever games were stirring at places where he retired — as gammons, tables, piquet, or even the sordid game of gleeke — the gamesters always were to have been a favourite game in the days of the Merry Monarch, for we find Pepys playing it in 1663.

June 31, 1664.—With my wife, only to take the ayre, it being very warm and sultry, to Bow and [illegible] and there eat cream and strawberries, and then play at shuffleboard, eat cream and good cherries, and so with good refreshment, home.

April 5, 1665.—"Creed, my wife, and Mercer and I, by coach to take the ayre, and, where we had formerly been, at Chelsey, and there eat cakes and cream, and so home, and I to my vocation of the house, and after a game or two at shuffleboard, home.

What is termed the "Harmonicon" was a instrumental music in 1664 and one of 1865. Let us refer to the former:—

Oct. 4, 1664.—To the musique meeting at Gresham College. Where I was once before. And thither anon come all the Gresham College, and a great deal of fine company; and there was variety of musique, and they called the arched vault, where, being tuned with lute-strings, and played on with keys like an organ, and other instruments, it did make most moving and the strings, which by the keys are pressed down upon it, are gutted in imitation of a harpsicon, and played upon. But it is intended to resemble several viols played on with one bow, but so barely and to harshly that I do not like it, but after an hour's stay, it could not be fixed in tune; and so they were fain to go to some other musique of instruments."

Dec. 26, 1667.—To Sir Wm. Batten's, where Mr. Coventry and all our families here, and Sir R. Ford and his, and a great feast, and good discourse and mirth, and no harm at all, but a little bit of gaming innocently as cards, very merry. I to bed, leaving them to their sport and [illegible] at bed."

Backgammon, under the title of tables, appears to have been a fashionable game among the gentlemen of the court.

Sept. 16, 1665.—"I walked to my Lord Brouncker's, and there staid to dinner, they being at tables."

The quaint secretary seems to have realised the saying, "Tales as they are told," for he frequently mentions the same anecdote as often recounted, that he never again would play for money, we find the following:—

21st of the same month.—"I got to my Lord Brouncker's before night, and there I sat and supped with him. Thence, after losing 6 crowns at tables, I to walked home."

We now proceed to notice a birthday ball at Court; but what the dances called the Branles, the Coranto, and the Jig, in which Pepys were, we know not.

Nov. 15, 1665.—"To Mrs. Pierce's, where I find her as fine as possible, and Mr. Pierce going to the ball at night at Court; it being the Queen's birthday. I also by Mrs. Pierce's desire staid to see them all to the loft, where with much trouble I could see very well. Anon the house grew full, and the candles lighted, and the King and Queen, and all the ladies set. Presently after the King was come in he took the Queen, and about fourteen more couple there was, and began the Branles. After the Branles there was the Coranto, and the Jig, a French dance; but that so rare that the Courants grew tiresome, that I wished for it done. Only Mrs. Stuart danced the Jig most rarely, and the French dances, specially one the King called the new dance, which was very pretty; but, upon the whole matter, was not pleased, the dancing itself was not extraordinary pleasing."

The sole observance of the Sabbath was unquestionably, not much attended to during the period that Charles II. ruled over this country; for we find card-playing on that day frequently alluded to.

Feb. 17, 1667.—"This evening going to the Queen's side, her Majesty's apartments at Whitehall, I found the Duke of York at bowl the Queen, the Duchess of York, and another or two at cards, with the room full of great ladies and men. This is usual with them to do on a Sunday, having not believed; but, contrarily, flatly denied the same a little while since to my cousin, Roger Pepys."

Cheating at cards and accusations of cheating have not been confined to modern days, and in looking back to old records we find many instances in which noblemen and gentlemen moving in the highest circles have been accused of these malpractices. Among others, Pepys tells us the following anecdote:—

Feb. 7, 1661.—"Among others, Mr. Creed and Captain Ferrers tell me the cause for my Lord Duke of Buckingham's late fall, and his falling out, at Hurle de Grace, at cards; they two, and my Lord St. Albans playing. The Duke of York, I hear, do himself declare, say that he did in his conscience know the contrary to what he then said about the interference at cards; and that he was sorry for it that he should have lost to my Lord, which, my Lord resenting, said nothing then, but he doubted he should find a time when he was enough to get his money of him. So they parted that night; and my Lord sent Sir R. Stayner the next morning to the Duke, to know whether he did remember what he said last night, and whether he would owne it with his sword and a second; which he said he would, and so both sides agreed. But my Lord St. Albans, and the Queen and Ambassador Montagu did waylay them at their lodgings till the difference was made up, to my Lord's honour, who hath got great reputation thereby."

To show to what extent gambling was carried during the last century, we lay before our readers an extract of a letter, dated Feb. 11, 1775, from Horace Walpole to Sir Horace Mann, in which he says:—"The Duke of Northumberland lost £2300 at quince at the ball; the victorious name of Marlborough won most of it." Again he touches upon the subject in a manner that, to adopt a commonplace phrase, reflects greatly to the credit of his heart and head. He writes:—"To-day (Aug. 16, 1776). I have heard the saddest story of Mr. Dance's death, who shot himself yesterday, at three o'clock in the morning, at a tavern in Covent Garden. It is almost impossible to refrain from bestowing upon him some tender reflections on this occasion; but can the walls of Alsnack's help mourning when £9000 a year in present, and £12,000 in reversion, are not sufficient for feeling one's misfortunes?"

Another anecdote of play is worth recording, which we beg to quote for the amusement of our readers, and which is from "Anne Otranto." It is as follows:—

"The Duchess of Grafton this morning that Lord Beesborough and he, playing at quinze t'other night with Miss Pelham, and happening to shuffle the cards, Lord Beesborough said, 'Pray, Miss Pelham, what is the deal?' And on my two aces together,' said Lord Dillon, 'make up with a hundred and forty.'"

Having dwelt at some length upon modern and bygone play; and writing, as we do, with a view of encouraging and not of the evil effects of gambling, we wish, in conclusion, give the opinions of one well calculated to produce an effect upon the mind of our readers. Then the writer thus expresses himself:—

"There is no grievance, public or private, of which, since I took upon me the office of a censor, I have more frequently had to complain, or so earnest complaints, as of the predominance of play: of a fatal infatuation which has taken possession of persons of every rank, and the ambition of excellence, but the desire of pleasure; to have overcome almost every other vice, and in the room of avarice and frivolous, in its future progress, to destroy all distinctions, both of rank and merit. To this all emulation has shut up its breast, to which those classes of our people whose ancestors have, by their virtue, their industry, or their parsimony, given them the power of living in splendour, have sacrificed, and vice, and to leave them without knowledge, but of the modish games, and without wishes, but for lucky hands."

The following is a list of the games at present played or introduced by a conspicuor of the old, the ugly, and the ignorant against the young and the beautiful and the wise, and is commended to the travel all distinctions of nature and of art, to confound the world in a state of chaos. Let the following list be read and studied by all, but to withheld youth from its natural pleasures, deprive wit of its influence and beauty of its power, will not be the way to prepare us which love has hitherto been entitled, to sink life into a listless insensibility, and allow it no other hope or fears but those of winning and being robbed."

THE MAGAZINES.

The best vapor in this month's Macmillan proceeds from the "Contention Wallah," who surpasses himself in liveliness and esprit, compared with the dull stupidity of the rest. The "Contention Wallah" maturing under the influence of administrative experience, and we are convinced that the public will not long be without the fruits of his blossom. His subject on the present occasion is the Hindoo character, which he describes as one of the most extraordinary in the world, and in some sort, a problem to the most experienced European, his remarks are highly suggestive as well as amusing. "The Hindoo," he says, "is the most powerful of all the motives which actuate the conduct of a man, and the most powerful is that in fear." Let no one say that we have ruled, and fought, and panted, and perspired, and permanently settled in vain, as long as we have taught one Mahometan or one Hindoo to respect us. The Hindoo lives on scarcely up to the usual mark. Professor Masson's reminiscences of his ancient pupils are interesting and graphic as usual. Mr. Hamerton's paper on the questions of international law, suggested by the recent seizure of the Confederate envoys on board the British mail steamer, as the production of one who speaks with the authority derived from a long experience as a writer, will not fail to be read with interest by science. The review of "My Beautiful Lady" is rather too much of a puff. In the article entitled "Pictures in Words," the author of "Elizabeth," spirited and picturesque as it certainly is, We fear that Mr. Hepworth Dixon's writing is becoming rather rose-water. In taking to alter a famous line of Locock he commits a blunder in quantity which would have overwhelmed him with ridicule in the days of Porson. Mr. Hepworth Dixon's geography will not soon suffer him to hear the last :—

Tros Tyriusve mihi nullo discrimine sit, Phœbe, et virtu pollis.

The Cornhill is scarcely so good as usual this month. Mr. Trollope's chapters are dull, and the rest of the tale in the Cornhill but little interest. Nor are the present instalments of "Cousin Phillis" and "Framley Parsonage" remarkable. The strength of the magazine lies in the lighter articles. There is a capital sketch of that miniature England, Yorkshire; while a less agreeable subject is handled by the author of "Contributions to Social Science." Concubinage, however, with a graceful humility, "The essence of style and the art of writing" is a few years ago, "Lectures on Parliamentary Committees," are also light, entertaining articles. Mr. Noel Paton's "Poems by Two Brothers," a reminiscence of Tennyson's Ulysses, or thereabouts: but it is also the best. The magazine concludes with a paper entitled "Our Public Schools," the editor considers it unnecessary to invite "Jacob Omnium" to continue the discussion, as he has said all that can be said. We are not told, but, probably, from a doubt whether the redoubtable Jacob would be in a mood to write on such a topic.

The Victoria relies mainly on its travellers. Miss Cobbe describes a visit to the Grotto of Adelsberg with her accustomed vivour of style and liveliness. There is also a few verses commemorative of the same time amiable writers than this erudite and gifted lady. Mr. Cheney's paper on Spanish Literature is full of material for interest, while illustrating nothing so forcibly as the extreme difficulty of arriving at any satisfactory conclusion on the whole subject. It chiefly consists of the records of numerous conversations held with the various literary characters of Spain, in which each one contradicts his predecessor, and support all their conflicting views with such quotations from the works of the various authors as are unknown to us before. We hope Mr. Senior, who has as yet volunteered no opinion in the row, will favour us with a judicial summing up before he proceeds. Dizzy sums up the philosophy of the Schleswig-Holstein dispute in a sentence—"The Danes mean to keep the Duchies, and the Germans mean to get them."

A star simultaneously sets and rises in Temple Bar in the shape of Miss Braddon's new novel, which begins in the same number that witnesses the completion of "John Marchmont's Legacy." Paul Bertrand Hamilton's paper on "Modern Spiritualism" is interesting, and Miss Braddon recounts the details with a minuteness for which she can only have obtained the data from the spirits themselves. It is somewhat less sensational. The best thing in the magazine is very spirited sketch of "Paris in 1863," by Mr. Hamerton, who, in the St. James's, is a capital story. The chevet de bataille of the magazine, however, is the new novel of Mr. Wilkie Collins, which promises to go beyond all its competitors in sensational extravagance. The Cornhill is peculiarly improved, containing one or two really good tales; a paper on Church music by the highest living authority; a good account of the Cape, and a very fair instalment of a new story by the authoress of "The Heir of Redclyffe," entirely devoted to the interests, hopes, and fears of children, and free from the entire journal. We have to chronicle the appearance of a new magazine, the Victoria, published by Routledge, and to commend the first number as a most valuable repository of useful contributions to almost every department of scientific research.

We shall notice Blackwood and Fraser next week.

COUNTRY NEWS.

The Philanthropic Society of Paris has published its report for 1862. From the clean food kitchens established in different parts of the capital is distributed 290,461 portions of food, the produce of which was 11,703f., and the expenses 23,522f. In the six dispensaries, 1173 patients have received medical assistance, and 3000 prescriptions have been made up. Out of that number of sick 31 died, being a smaller proportion than taken in the hospitals. The dispensaries have distributed 1,000,000 doses of medicines and bottles of mineral waters, or about 24c. per patient.—Galignani.

The Commissioners of the Inland Fishery under the late Act are so great holding a Court in Limerick, and are engaged in defining the limits of the several districts, and appointing the Conservators to the same. Their labours will be arduous.

A silver cup, weighing ninety ounces, has been presented to Mr. M'Mahon, M.P., with the following inscription :—"Presented to Patrick M'Mahon, Esq., M.P., by the Conservative Association of Limerick, in testimony of the services of Guidance of Galway and Mayo, Ireland, in acknowledgment of his able and successful advocacy of the Act of 1860, for the Amendment of the Fishery Laws (Ireland), 1863."

Sir John Pakington addressed a meeting at Kidderminster, on Monday, on education and the cheap press. He complimented the committee of the Society for the Repeal of the Taxes on Knowledge, stating that would ever be the character of the newspapers of this country. He urged the people to support cheap literature, by the means of co-operation, and that none even children being early taken from school.

An effort is being made to assimilate the money of Ireland with that of England, and for this purpose an Irish Money Law Reform Association has been formed in Dublin. At a meeting of the committee on the subject, the movement seems to be an influential one, and according to the speakers, there is no doubt that a second visit to Ireland by Sir Robert Peel will be made.

The rare circumstance of a maiden session in a garrison and seven days' sessions occurred at Dover, on Monday. Mr. Sergeant Ballantine, in dismissing the grand jury, observed:—"I have sat as Recorder for thirty years, and never before have I had a session without a single case for examination. I wish you a merry Christmas and a happy new year."

Another, making the twelfth, occurred at Ross on the Yorkshire Webb occurred at Hoggetts on Wednesday midnight. It was found out early, and the flames extinguished before much harm was done. On Thursday night a fire of incendiary origin was discovered in the premises of a number of incendiary fires of late has caused an extraordinary number of special constables to be sworn in, and the office has been opened for raising the rate from 6d. to one guinea per week, for farm produce.

The gardens of the Marquis of Bute are about to be constructed by the Rhymney Railway Company, at a cost of £10,000. The quay will be 1000 ft. in length, 100 ft. wide, and 30 ft. high, and will be built in three tiers, and eight decks. The country road is to be diverted from the present line to the north, and a new road is also being constructed from Cardiff to Penarth. The latter road will be 2 miles long; but steam-coal mines were discovered there, which have proved to be of immense value. The owners of these mines will be compelled to bring in a princely income. The Marquis's waterside property was given to his son at his marriage with Miss Crichton, daughter of Lord Ashburton.

On Saturday Mr. J. Chapman, M.P., the chairman of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, entertained at dinner at his residence, Hill End, Mottram, Messrs. Underdown, Lingard, Rees, Williams, and Hall, the chief officers of the company, and Messrs. Rix, Underdown and Mrs. Rees. After dinner, Mr. Chapman, as a personal mark of his esteem for Mr. Rees, presented him with a handsome silver cup and shower service, in addition to a silver candelabrum and other articles, the value of which is stated to be upwards of £100. In the course of the evening a munificent testimonial Mr. Chapman alluded to the great services Mr. Rees had rendered to the company, and observed that, during the period during the eighteen years he has been in their service. Mr. Rees was warmly applauded on rising to return thanks.

On the 19th ult. 132,676 persons were receiving parochial relief in the metropolis, or 1 in 27 of the district's population. In a week in 1046 on the number relieved in the preceding week; but, on the other hand, the number relieved was considerably less than in corresponding weeks of 1862, we find that in the two months no fewer than 31,500 persons have been relieved for the first time. The number of persons in the receipt of outdoor relief on the present occasion is the same as in the week ending 224,989. Three parcels of clothing had been received and eight bales of clothing and one parcel of linen had been sent to the Mansion-house. The following grants, with others, were made:—Preston, £2000; Blackburn, £1000; Wigan, £1000; Bolton, £1000; Ashton-under-Lyne, £1000; and Burnley, £1000. Mottram-in-Longdendale, £100; Gorton, £100; Pendlebury and Swinton, £100.

A curious accident occurred to the train on the Cork and Passage line on Monday morning. The train in question usually carried 1000 passengers. The springs of one of the carriages gave way from the great weight upon them, and the axle of the wheels was broken. For a short time the friction caused the wood to ignite; but the fire was soon in tune and the train was proceeding on its journey, being obliged to go at a slow journey.—On Christmas Eve, as the half-past six p.m. express from Dublin was approaching the station at Kingstown, and was passing the platform at which it stops, the passengers in one of the carriages were startled by hearing a loud report, and the greatest consternation prevailed. The carriage being crowded with passengers; but, fortunately, the train was not thrown off the line. The carriage was examined, and the damage detailed to the axle.

Tuesday was the opening day of the Mechanics' Institute just erected at Dudley. From many of the upper windows of the building flags were flying, and in the front of the building the Wolverhampton-street flags were flying, and in the front of the building the Wolverhampton-street flags were flying, and in the front of the building the Wolverhampton-street

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The great battle over the five-thousand and three-thousand guinea bodies of the two Newminster chestnuts has ended in favour of Captain White. In the very middle of the steeple-chasing interval between the Captain and Lord St. Vincent's solicitor (who had already retained Mr. Hawkins) a telegraph-boy arrived with this simple message from the Lordship. "Withdraw claim"; and the Captain at once bolted over to over-eight one thousand Bank-of-England notes and the balance in smaller notes and specie; and, as Lord St. Vincent's solicitor came-rapidly well provided, Messrs. Tattersall's office, for the time being, was a perfect money changer. As Lord Lordship withdrew his claim, the Captain left the unspent wishes of Admiral Rous and his friends, who were anxious, for the sake of the law-case which has been settled, to get at some of the awkward polonies for these fourteen or fifteen months—that the matter should not come into a public court. The Captain's fair sister to Saschenmeister, his Lordship (who has a capital portrait and biography in the last number of Fun), and the Captain's friends all approached, as promising a lot as any at the sale. Sloth has not gone into Mr. Naylor's stable. When that gentleman made his claim on Jest have the Captain, he was entitled to claim Stanford, literally the Messrs. Tattersall, that he might have her if he liked; but he has since withdrawn his claim, so that she is left in the sale with the more than memorable sale.

The sister stakes of Rogl is out once more, with its careful resume of the two-year-old running; and the Messrs. Weatherby have published the first list for the years 1861-3. It embraces 487 names, among which Ada De Clare (£180) is most heavily in arrear. The sum total is £9300; and, considering that upwards of £2,000 out of all stakes have been run for during that period, the percentage of arrears is decidedly small. Many of these counted out of sums varying from £1 to £10; and £300 is still to be accounted for upon Macaroni's Derby, either to Mr. Naylor or nominators who have paid up and have to look to their nominators for reimbursement. Of the horses in the head of the sire list with 76 races, or £22,140: Stockwell is second, with 73, or £20,920; and then follow Sir Hercules, Newminster, Stanford, Birdcatcher and Kingston, with 32, or £11,790. King Tom, who depends upon his two-year-old winnings, and has only 7 races, or £2,000, so early in consequence, is credited with 41 races, or £9950; and Voltigeur, who has only three two-year-old winners (one a dead one), with 40 races, or £9068. Newminster has made a great year of it, in every way with Lord Clifden, Scottish Chieftain, Scorcella, Sarcasm, &c. Stockwell's two-year-olds are again not up to the mark, considering the large number of sires and the bulk of Sweetmeat's success is due to Macaroni, who has won £13,105, or £3,000 more than Lord Clifden, who comes next in the list. Such is the vital difference between "one colt finishing with his head up, and another with his head down for a Derby." Mr. Alsop's advantage is a bold, and fortunate one, in the eyes of the public; while those who lament Sunstreer have a good ten-guinea chance offered them by the Hermitage nomination, which is sure to risk the sea voyage. We may add that the highest priced yearlings, filly and colt, are—Bonillon, £2,000, by Mr. Merry; purchased by Mr. Naylor, from the Rawcliffe Company; and Archimedes (2000gs.), by Newminster, bred by Mr. Merry, purchased by Mr. very celebrated colt has made 1200gs. more than Lord of the Hills, for whom Mr. Merry has also won the valuable Ascot Stakes.

The scent with the Badminton has been rather bad for lack of rain, but still they have had seven or eight very good days' hunting. Wind and dry weather have proved considerable drawbacks throughout the whole of the past month, and told very much against the Queen, the Mid-Surrey, the Belvoir, and other packs. Reynard has killed four foxes in or near Bradgate Park, on the 15th, after short scrutiny; and on the 19th the Mid-Surrey had a run of half an hour, killing their first fox after a ten minutes' burst, and their second, after chasing their foxes twice round, and then running. With the exception of some stormy days at the beginning of the month, the same may be remarked of the Wynnstay and the Cheshire, has been capital. With a good scent out of cover the Cheshire have done well, as they have done almost for years. The North Devon are most abundantly supplied with foxes this season, and thanks simply to the severity of the frost. The Grafton and Atherstone have had their share of the fun with the old Berkshire.

And so ends the Lord Clifden and Macaroni year. It has been a good average one for every kind of sport; it has produced the three most remarkable sires (new and old) of the day, according to the records of "The Turf and the Chace;" and if we add in "The Road" it has produced the last of the great "pedestrian phenomenon," Sir Tatton Sykes, Mr. Gully, Mr. Tom Hodgson, and Sir Vincent Cotton.

The Government emigrant-ship Peerless, 1005 tons, Captain Thomas Plaire, belonging to Messrs. Dixon and Wynne, Liverpool, and which sailed from the Mersey on the 2nd of July, arrived at Melbourne on the 2nd of September, having on board 29 married couples, 11 single men, 121 single women, 21 men and 13 girls between the ages of one and fourteen years, and numbering 295 souls. Six births and four deaths took place on the voyage.

A number of new rules to regulate the practice of County Courts, both in bankruptcy cases and in ordinary cases, have come into force. The rules have been sanctioned by the Lord Chancellor, and by Lewisham is empowered by the same authority to make rules for the future to be in a County Court office in every place where a County Court is held. The rules are to be printed and hung up in a conspicuous place in the bailiff, there to be kept a list of the names of the bailiffs, and a list of the amounts the defendant can pay the money at any time "before the bailiff is delivered to the goods."

The Tomb of Ezra the Scribe.—This is the age of comprehension. While we here in England are preparing to celebrate the three hundredth anniversary of the burial of Shakespeare, the Arab of Asia are busirring the ruins to erect a monument to the memory of the great restorer of the Jewish law. Ezra, who died and was buried at Ahwaz about the year 1100 years, the Jews of Bagdad have been in the habit of making pilgrimages to the spot which the most ancient tradition has designated as his grave, and the environs of which there is no reason to doubt were the scene of the adventure the confluence of the Euphrates and Tigris, and the monument to be established in the ruin only one befitting the memory of the great scribe, and by Christians as Jews. The proposed monument is a colossal for the study of the writings preserved from the wreck of the Jewish nation. Subscriptions for this purpose have been forwarded from Bombay, London, and Paris.

Evidence without Cross-examination.—It is not unusual to obtain information than some people may think; the most-don't know anything, and those who do don't like to tell it. Some of the best is derived from the history of an inquiry, which took place four or five years ago, into the desirableness of making a new line of railway. The case, in substance was giving what is called "traffic evidence" in justification of the alleged need of the railway, and this is where the fun comes in. The gentleman examining counsel for the opponents of the new line: Do you mean to tell the Committee how often you ever saw an individual travelling on the railway? Yes, I do.—Mr. Brown: Did you ever see a vehicle there in all your life?—Answer: Yes, I have seen vehicles there.—Mr. Brown: Did you ever see a cart, yes, or two cart loads?—Answer: I particularly remember seeing a cart that was leaving the bar, the learned gentleman put one more question. Q. I am instructed to put it that the vehicle you saw was not the bearer of the last inhabitant?—Answer: It was.—Cornhill Magazine.

The Kingdom of Dalkey.—To the south of the Bay of Dublin, and near the land, is the island of Dalkey, with a population of about 2 thousand souls. In early periods it was the residence of St. Benedict, who founded a monastery there. In the year 1822 the inhabitants of Dalkey, tired of the burdens that were heaped upon them, and of the want of representation, resolved on the expediency to which Dublin was subject, and particularly during the great Repeal of 1843. There it became a matter of serious discussion how to make a charter given to it; although it was not until the height of the French Revolution that Dalkey was declared a kingdom. Then, as one of the first and most extreme opinions, when faction and violent reform were rampant, and when men, as every class and grade of society, plunged into the fascinating stream, and too often drifted out to sea without helm or pilot. As might be expected, the wits of the day had a great feeling of it, and nothing was too absurd to become the subject of a goal joke. Among the many absurdities that were then perpetrated, the Royal Island of Dalkey was formed into a kingdom, and was the subject of a grand demonstration once a year, when the "King of Dalkey" paid it a state visit for the purpose of having a successor elected, persons preached by the Primate, speech delivered of the most comic gravity, in which the toasts of the day were in reality handled under the veil of obscurity, and an immense amount of whisky drunk. The real significance of the proceedings consisted in the contest which was between Brunge and Corporation, who should be it worth while to engage in these antics, amongst which was the establishment of a newspaper called the Dalkey Gazette, in which the proceedings of the state or kingdom were chronicled.—Once a Week.

The Wesleyan Jubilee Missionary Fund now amounts to about £100,000. Contributions are still pouring in.

In the eleven months ending November, 7,360,848 pairs of gloves were brought into this country from foreign parts, being upwards of 1,000,000 pairs in excess of the number imported in 1862.

As some workmen were lately employed in digging for the foundation of a house opposite the Church of Saint Vincent-in-Rouen, they discovered a coffin of an old German, and found nothing in the urn. Some traces of it had been before seen when the large sewer was formed in the Rue de la Chaine, and some Roman coins and vases were found. Excavations for clearing away the ground near the part of the road now discovered, one of the most ancient in Rouen, will be made, and it is hoped that something more will be found to throw light on the history of the locality. The house in which the urn was attached, the coin, being much oxydized, broke in two, and one part was lost. It is supposed to be a coin of the Emperor Gallienus, who reigned in the reign of Louis le Debonnaire, one of the sons of the Emperor Charlemagne.

All the books and papers connected with the affairs of the Great Ship Company have been seized by Mr. Bright, the official liquidator appointed by the Court of Chancery to wind up the company's affairs. The proceedings under the liquidation" scheme, which is virtually a new act of winding, under the Winding-up Act, to call in creditors, who, it is said, still have claims to the extent of £100,000, and to call in the shareholders to pay up the amount of their shares. The liquidator and his solicitor would have been sold to satisfy the claims of Mr. Parry. The company being registered under the Limited Liability Act, the shareholders are responsible only to the extent of their shares, which are all paid up, renders a call upon them for the remainder impossible, unless they can be forced to resort to the establishment of a new company, or the purchase of her by the proposed lottery.——

The Government have determined to withdraw from the Indian Navy the duty of disposing of the screw-steamer Great Eastern by lottery. The capital is to be 80,000 shares, at £10 each, and the number of prizes 40,000 each for £100, there being 200 prizes in all.

Thirty Men Cut from the Moon."—Un-ya-mesi (Country of Moon) must have been one of the largest kingdoms in Africa. It is little inferior in size to England, and of much the same shape. Its capital, instead of being united, it is cut up into petty States. In its northern extremities it is bounded by Unyanyembe (Country of Moon), and on the south by Ugogo (Ukanea country south). There are no historical traditions known to the natives of Unyamesi, and consequently no information can be got as far as we know, until the Hindoos, who traded with the east coast of Africa, penetrated into the interior. The Arabs call it Unyamesi, or Country of the Moon, because the natives say that thirty men were cut from the moon and with their name Men of the Moon) sprang into existence the Mountains of the Moon. Unyamesi is the land of the Wanyamesi, the greatest traders in Africa, and are the only people who, for love of barter and change, will penetrate into the country of an unknown tribe. They are a fine race, with as much zeal as our country-folk go to a fair. As far back as we can trace their history they have been in the habit of visiting the Unyanyembe country ranges from 2000 ft. to 4000 ft. above the sea level—a high plateau, studded with hills, intersected with valleys, and watered by streams. In these valleys there are numerous fertilising springs of fresh water, and rich iron-ore is found in the neighbourhood of Kazeh, the capital of Unyanyembe. The climate is healthy, the cultivation extensive, and the country in search of which we have been writing and work it up very expertly, build tombs to live in over a large portion of their territory. The Arabs are not to be found in the Kaze district in any considerable extent. The Wanyamesi, or People of the Moon, however, are to be met with everywhere. They are a splendid race—taller, stronger, and darker than either the Waswamo or the Wagogo, though many of their customs are identical with those. They are brave, and do not fear death, dressed or well armed, being wanting in pluck and gallantry. Their women, generally speaking, are handsome. They are scattered round under the arms are their national custom, along with a necklace of beads and a cloth round the waist, which is made of the bark of a tree beaten out. Their ornaments consist of brass wire bracelets, anklets, necklaces, and copper wire; whilst the men at home wear bits-cloths, but in the field, or whilst travelling, they wear a piece of cloth round the shoulders, exposing at least three fourths of their body. In all other respects they ornament themselves in the same manner as the men, and are as much given to dye the arms, they content themselves with having massive rings of copper or brass on the ankles and arms. The men wear a spear and shield, and carry a bill-hook more or less their lower incisors, and cut a between the two upper incisors. They are a very peaceful, inoffensive race, and greatly given to drink.—Captain Speke's Sources of the Nile.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

NOTWITHSTANDING that the quotations for the precious metals have ascended about £100,000, and that the exchange at Bombay by the present mail means 1½ per cent. in favour of London, the Bank of England has lost £1,000,000 of bullion during the last week. In the present week, however, the fluctuation have been trifling. There has been a demand for gold for Paris, and the Bank has sold £100,000 in sovereigns at 77s. 9d. per oz. The supply of silver is much in excess of demand, and has declined 1d. per oz., and the prospect of heavy demands upon our supplies of gold, have, no doubt, had an influence in depressing the quotations for silver.

The Bank of England has published its return for the week ending the 31st ult., obtained from the Bank of England until the 5th of January, at 3 per cent.; while that of the Bank of France remains unchanged at 4 per cent. The minimum rate for the open market the best commercial paper is now done as follows:—

Three months' ... ... 2½ per cent. Four months' ... ... 2½ per cent. Three months' ... ... 2½ per cent.

The total amount of bullion capital is held from 4 to Paris the Bank has made no advances under 6 per cent. The accounts this week are as follows:—

The minimum quotation for accommodation at the Bank of England is now 3 per cent.

The Bank of England has published its return for the week ending the 31st ult. New York state that the supply of bullion in the banks was reduced to £1,300,000 on the 27th inst., and the amount of specie in the banks of Boston was reduced to £1,000,000. The Bank of England has published its return for the week ending the 31st ult. The total reserve is £22,000,000 in 1862, and £21,200,000 in 1863.

as an advocate soon gave him higher and more extended range, and for many years he has been, indisputably, the very first man at the English Bar. His name has been connected as counsel with some of the most famous trials of his time; such, for instance, as those relating to the Anguil and Roupell properties; the British Bank; the Queen v. Webster, prosecuted by the Attorney-General, Sir Fitzroy Kelly; the Queen v. Pollock, in 1842, on the order of the House of Commons, for bribery at the election of St. Albans; the cases of the British Bank; of the Bagsley poisoner, Palmer; and of Hatch, the clergyman. Mr. Shee became a Serjeant-at-Law in 1840, obtained a patent of precedence in 1846, and was made a Queen's Serjeant in 1856. At the general election of 1847 Serjeant Shee stood, in the Liberal interest, for the borough of Marylebone, but was defeated. He was elected to Parliament for the county of Kilkenny in 1852, and remained its representative till 1857, but has not since sat in Parliament. Latterly, his immense practice entirely absorbed his time. Serjeant Shee was most popular at the Bar for his sterling worth and genial manners. He has already gone circuit as Judge of Assize, and has won golden opinions from the Bar and the public for his dignified bearing, his courtesy, and his eminently judicial temper and acquirements. A better appointment to the Bench could not have been made; for this eloquent and learned lawyer is well known to possess such high order of intellect, keen sense of honour, and thorough rectitude of purpose, without one shade of bigotry—such qualities, in fine, as must bring additional lustre to the English Bench. His Lordship married, Dec. 26, 1837, Mary, sister of the present Sir Robert Glendonwyn Gordon, ninth Baronet, of Gordonstown and Letterfourie, Banffshire, Premier Baronet of Scotland, and daughter of Sir James Gordon, the seventh Baronet, by his wife, Mary, daughter and heir of William Gleadowyn, Esq., of Glendonwyn. Mrs. Shee died Oct. 11, 1861, and his Lordship has now an only surviving daughter.

THE PAMPERO.

THIS vessel, launched a short time ago from the building-yard of Messrs. J. G. Thomson, Glasgow, has created a good deal of interest, owing to a suspicion being pretty generally entertained that it was intended to make her a consort to the Alabama, Georgia, and Florida. Shortly after being launched, the Emancipation Society at Glasgow addressed a memorial to Earl Russell, stating that they had reasons for supposing her to be for that service, and praying for an investigation into the matter. To this Earl Russell replied that the attention of her Majesty's Government had already been directed to this vessel. No interference with the vessel took place beyond posting customs officers near her berth and moving from Greenock the gun-boat Goldfinch, one of the tenders to her Majesty's ship Hogue, stationed there, and placing her on the opposite side of the harbour to the Pampero. Recently, the Lord Advocate of Scotland instructed the customs authorities to detain her, and she is now in charge of a gang of blackjackets. The Pampero is a handsome steamer of 1000 tons, builders' measurement; length, 230 ft.; beam, 31 ft.; depth, 20 ft.; with direct-acting engines of 200-horse power. She is finely sparred, and her main and fore masts, of iron, are capable of spreading a large area of canvas. Her funnel is telescopic. She has lifting screw, and patent reefing topsails. Our Engraving of the Pampero is from a sketch by Mr. Hugh Aird, of Glasgow.

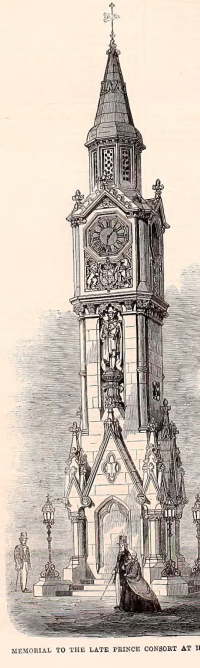
THE BARTLOW HILLS, ESSEX.

IN the county of Essex, on the south border of Cambridgeshire, are four tumuli, arranged in a row and varying in size, the largest being 112 ft. in diameter at the base and 44 ft. high. The adjacent village of Bartlow, from which these artificial hills derive their name, is in Cambridgeshire, but the hills are in the parish of Ashdon, Essex. Excavations made in them in the years 1832, 1835, and 1838 (of which accounts are given in vols. xxv., xxvi., and xxvii. of the Archæologia) distinctly prove them to be Roman works. Many curious and valuable sepulchral relics were discovered in them, but they were unfortunately lost in the fire which burned down Easton Lodge, near Dunmow, the seat of Viscount Maynard, on whose estates the hills are situated. It was feared that these venerable landmarks were condemned to destruction in order to accommodate a feeder of the Great Eastern Railway. The matter having been brought under the notice of the Archæological Institute, that body at once addressed a remonstrance to the railway directors. At a recent meeting of the institute, Mr. Furnell, the secretary, read the correspondence which had passed with the Great Eastern Railway Company on the subject. The engineer-in-chief, in one of his letters, states that it was never his intention to injure the hills, but he admits his design to bring the proposed line between two of them. Here the matter at present rests. It is to be hoped that the good feeling of the railway directors will cause them to spare these famous Roman grave-mounds. Our Engraving of the Bartlow Hills is from a photograph by Mr. G. Collins, Southgate-grove, Islington.

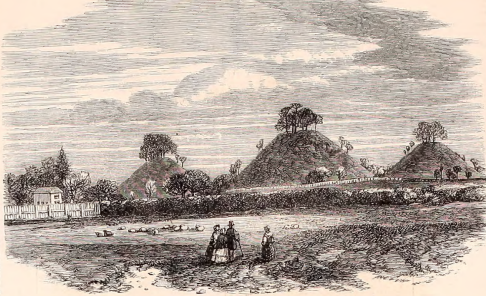
THE ALBERT MEMORIAL HASTINGS.

Soon after the death of the Prince Consort a premium was offered by a committee, consisting of Thomas Ross, Esq. (late Mayor of Hastings), the Rev. Dr. Crosse, and other influential gentlemen in the borough, for the best design for a memorial to his Royal Highness. Thirty-seven designs were submitted in competition, and, after having been exhibited for a short time, one by Mr. Edward A. Heffer, of Liverpool, a pupil of the late Mr. John Thomas, was selected. The committee then appointed Mr. Heffer to carry out the work of erection at once. After experiencing some difficulties with the foundations, which were obliged to be laid 14 ft. below the ground, the foundation-stone was laid by the Mayor, on the 10th of November, 1862, and the structure was completed in July last.



The memorial is situated at the junction of seven streets, at the Priory. The tower, in the Perpendicular style, rises 65 ft. to the vane. The entrance, the door of which is of oak, is on the west side. On the east side a massive granite drinking-basin is fixed, and on the north and south sides panels for future inscriptions are left in the basement. In a niche above the gable on the north side is fixed a statue, of Portland stone, representing the good Prince in his robes as K.G., the head of the niche being filled in with tracery.

Below the dials are tracerried panels, with plain shields, on the north, east, and west sides; but on the south side the panelling is filled by the arms and supporters of his Royal Highness.



Above the clock-chamber is an octagonal turret, with pierced quatrefoils of alternate design, for the chimes; and a plain spire, with ornamental terminal and gilded vane, with the letter "A" incised, completes the whole. A lamp is placed upon a large block of York stone at each angle, and between these are four steps of the same material. The diameter at the base of the tower is 15 ft., and at the clock-chamber 8 ft. The carvings represent respectively the rose, England; thistle, Scotland; shamrock, Ireland; dragon, Wales; and the capitals to octagon shafts the vine, Joy, &c. Above the doorway the following inscription is cut upon a ribbon and in the spandrels:—"Erected to Albert the Good, in the year of our Lord 1862." In a panel above, the arms of Hastings are cut.

The contractors were Mr. Edwin Stirling, sculptor, Liverpool; Mr. James Cowley, mason, Hastings; and Mr. Pattenden, builder, Hastings; Messrs. Hart and Son supplying the lamps and other ornamental ironwork. The whole of the work, the carving especially, has been admirably executed, every one working con amore.

Our Engraving is from a photograph by Messrs. Ayles and Bonniwell, Trinity House, Hastings.

WYCLIFFE CHAPEL, BIRMINGHAM.

THIS building is in the fourteenth-century style of Gothic architecture, and is erected in stone of various sorts and tints, Bath stone from the quarries of Messrs. Randal and Saunders being used for all the wrought parts and for the spire. The chapel is used by the Baptists, and stands at the corner of Saint Luke's-street, in Bristol-road, Birmingham. It seats about 800 persons, and, besides the chapel, contains three vestries, a large library, two spacious schoolrooms, and the usual offices. Side and end galleries are round three sides of the interior, and these are supported by iron shafts of wrought and cast metal, with hammer-dressed foliage for the capitals; and these shafts run up to support the roofs. A platform at the end of the chapel, opposite the end gallery, affords space for the pulpit—of carved stone, beautifully cut by Wood, of Lichfield—and for the baptistery, of white marble. The roofs of the chapel are divided into three, those over the galleries being arched and groined in wood, and that over the centre part being framed and panelled. The platform in the chapel, the baptistery, the lead flat at the roof-slope where the ventilators stand, many of the gables, the outside fence, and other parts of the building, including the iron columns, had been enriched by wrought metal-work, manufactured by Mr. Thomas Brawn, of Clement-street, Birmingham. The works were built at a cost of £6000, by Messrs. Hardwick and Son, of Birmingham, under the directions of Mr. James Cranston, architect, also of Birmingham.

MONUMENT AT ST. FOYE, NEAR QUEBEC.

A MONUMENT has lately been erected at St. Foye, a village near Quebec, in commemoration of the French and English who fell there in 1759, during the second siege of the city. It is constructed of cast iron, bronzed, and rests on a stone base. Its height is 60 ft., and it is crowned by a draped statue of Bellona, in bronze, sent to Canada from France, a present from Prince Napoleon. The pedestal is enriched with reliefs, encircling, on one side, the name of Murray, the General who led the defence; and on the opposite side that of Levis, commander of the French troops. M. Charles Baillargis was the architect. Our Engraving is from a photograph by M. Livernois.

The monument was inaugurated with great éclat by Lord Monck, Governor-General of Canada, on the 19th of October last.

The quality of every instrument may be relied upon as at least equal to the representation. Every Pianoforte is warranted carefully selected from the stock. Every facility is afforded for exchange, without loss to the buyer, any time within six months, if the instrument of a higher class, or by a different maker, be thought desirable.

CRAMER'S ENGLISH PIANETTE, 37 inches.—Cramer, Wood, and Co. manufacture this upright model Instrument, with all the latest improvements, in handsome walnut and rosewood cases, at 35 guineas, and in elaborately carved cases of polished oak. In proceeding on this Pianette the Agents of the Firm have had in view the production of a model which shall be thoroughly English in every respect, and which shall be reasonable in guineas; in walnut, 35 guineas.

Purchasers are respectfully requested to observe that CRAMER, WOOD, and CO.'s Pianettes have not the double or check action; and that Cramer, Wood, and Co. are the only makers of these of the check action. 201, Regent-street.

CRAMER'S INDIAN PIANOFORTE. Cramer, Wood, and Co. manufacture for India a superior Pianoforte, with all the latest improvements, in solid mahogany, with metallic plates, and trichord throughout, to resist the effect of extreme climates. Nothing has been omitted to render this instrument of the most perfect description, and it is strongly recommended by screws. Unusual skill and attention have therefore been bestowed on the manufacture of this instrument, which is guaranteed to stand for their climates and to be of the best and durability.

Cramer, Wood, and Co. deliver these Instruments f.o.b., packed in cases lined with tin, at the following prices:—Cottage, 25 guineas; Semi-Cottage, 28 guineas; Grand, 35 guineas. 201, Regent-street.

THE NEW PIANOFORTE.—CRAMER'S Seven-Octave Semi-Cottage Pianoforte

Is manufactured expressly for Cramer, Wood, and Co., and combines the following advantages in the Pianoforte:—Power and sustaining quality of tone; sympathy of touch; full scale of seven octaves.

The Cramer Pianoforte is manufactured in 4 ft. 8 in.; 4 ft. 4 in.; 4 ft. 1 in.; and 3 ft. 10 in. (with concave to 4 ft. 4 in.), affording increased convenience to the various requirements of apartments.

Combining the instrument preeminently to the notice of the public, Cramer, Wood, and Co. have only to add that the price of the Cramer Pianoforte will be found very moderate, in proportion to the quality and elasticity of touch, durability of tuning, and the capacity to stand in all climates. The price of the 4 ft. 8 in. model is 50 guineas; 4 ft. 4 in., 45 guineas; 4 ft. 1 in., 40 guineas; and 3 ft. 10 in., 35 guineas. In the one case there is no hardness, and in the other its absence is not felt, as the quality of tone is full and rich. Cramer, Wood, and Co. have also introduced a Pianoforte of 3 ft. 6 in., being somewhat similar in the principle of construction to those above, but with the trichord throughout, and the compass of seven octaves, from the full grand. Cramer, Wood, and Co. guarantee these instruments to be of the best description, and to stand in all climates. The price of this model is 30 guineas. 201, Regent-street.

DARLINGTON NEW COVERED MARKET.

THE rapid growth and largely increasing population of Darlington and its vicinity have been the means of inducing the Local Board of Health to erect the handsome and commodious new covered market of which we give an Engraving. This building is on the verge of completion, and was successfully opened by the Christmas show of the Northern Counties Fat Stock and Poultry Society, held on the 9th, 10th, and 11th ult. The event was rendered all the more auspicious in consequence of the show being unusually large. Almost all classes of animals were better and more numerously represented than on any previous occasion, whilst the entries for poultry were nearly doubled, augering a future of celebrity equal to that of Birmingham.

NEW COVERED MARKET AT DARLINGTON.

A GROUP AT NIJNI NOVGOROD.

ALTHOUGH few of our readers, probably, have seen, most of them have read or heard of, the great polynational fair held annually at Nijni Novgorod, Central Russia. This town, the capital of the government of the same name, is situated at the junction of the Oka and Volga rivers. It contains, ordinarily, about 30,000 inhabitants; but during the fair, held for eight weeks in autumn, there is an influx of nearly 300,000 of all nations. Situated, as it is, midway between the centres of European skill and Asiatic produce, the site is admirably suited for the purpose to which it has been put; and, now that further facilities for the transport of goods are increasing, the preparations for the fair are carried on with much less difficulty than was formerly the case.

The annexed Engraving was taken from a sketch made by a gentleman who was present at the last fair. "Everything," he says, "seemed to be procurable at Nijni—tea and ribbons, furs and fruit, cutlery and spices. Indeed, the mythical signboard, announcing the sale of 'pistols, pills, and jam,' might have been placed over some of the booths without very much misleading intending purchasers." In the central group of our illustration we have a Tartar trader of importance, weary of half an hour's beating about the bush, endeavouring to bring his bargaining to a conclusion; but he is foiled in his praiseworthy attempt by a cunning, bearded, tea-drinking Russian merchant, who, shrugging his shoulders, declares most solemnly that he is actually making a present of his goods to his "little father;" but so little is this statement believed that an Armenian, aristocratic and thin, stalks off, his honest conscience forbidding him to be a party to such cheating. Cossacks, too, are seen sprinkled amongst the motley crowd at Nijni. One of these strange customers we have represented as a quiet spectator to the bargaining. The stout fellow about to hoist a package is one of the common Tartars, who do most of the porterage work at Nijni: strong men they are, brawny and brown, with their black hair cropped quite close to the head, which bullet-shaped appendage is invariably covered with either a bright-coloured or a gold-embroidered skull-cap, fitting tightly to the head; this, again, is sometimes topped by a white sort of wide-awake in the poorer classes, or a rich fur cap, when such a summer's-day luxury can be afforded. In the figure with a stick, to the right, may be recognised the beggar of the country, his head bare save a thatching of matted hair, which hangs down in wild confusion over his repulsive face; his decrepit body protected from the rays of a burning sun by a sheepskin coat, redolent of grease in many forms. In the background are represented two Cossacks going their rounds. They are supposed to keep order, which office they partially perform just enough to save their consciences. The Cossack horses are very small, wiry, and clever animals; their long, matted manes, often reaching below their knees, give them a peculiarly wild look. On the left is a Tartar woman, her head enveloped in a thin handkerchief, her body clothed with the jacket peculiar to these people—very short in the waist and lined with fur; thickly padded, and pleated in the skirts, which stick ludicrously out.

The fair at Nijni is to some the only object for visiting Russia. Twenty-four hours' travelling from Murom will bring the stranger within sight of the white walls and blue domes of Novgorod. The fair is held in the autumn, and the weather is at that season generally fine, so that dust, not mud, will be the misery; but if there has been any rain, the road for the last nine miles will exceed in depth of the latter all that the tourist has ever been dragged through; and one traveller states that he was five hours performing the last five miles. This is caused by the carriages, kibitkas, and telegas of the different streams of traders and merchandise converging to the central point. Long lines of these vehicles will assure the stranger that he is approaching the town; bands of Cossacks, stationed by way of police in rude tents along the road, with their long lances glittering among the trees, are seen in large numbers; and crowds of Russian-looking men, in singular and varied costumes, become every moment more dense, until, on reaching Nijni, the crowd and turmoil surpass all description.

This fair, which was originally held at Kazan, the ancient capital of Tartary, was afterwards transferred to Makarief, about fifty miles below Nijni, on the banks of a boyard. At a still later period—viz., in 1817—this property was, for some reason, confiscated by the Crown, and Alexander then transferred the gathering to Nijni; but it is still called by Russians the fair of Makarief, or St. Macarius.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

THE time has not yet come for duly appreciating all that has been lost in William Makepeace Thackeray. To present his memory in any fresh that it is easy for regret to take a personal tone, forgetting admiration in friendship; whilst, at the same time, it is not difficult for regret to exalt itself into exaggerations of enthusiasm which may throw any appeal incongruous. Indeed, it is impossible for us yet to see fairly all the magnitude and harmonies of beauties in the great mind gone from amongst us. It is too near. As well might a man stand up with his nose against St. Paul's Cathedral and profess to see all the glories of Sir Christopher Wren. He would know himself to be in the midst with something very vast, but he would not know what was to him. But, standing backward, as the years pass on, the lines come out, the masses of beauty and effect, the proportions of truth, and the hopeful ambition is seen towering over all. So, some day, will people think and say of the author of "Vanity Fair," whose blended charms of his genius, proud of their countryman, and ever assimilating what they can learn of his own characteristics, as Sir Henry Esmond, Esquire; Colonel Newcome, or plain Mr. George Warrington. Thackeray died on Christmas Eve. Often has it been thought, and sometimes said, that the melancholy of the season is either calmative, failing on a festival day, subdues that festival in associated sorrow, or may yearn to heighten perhaps. But nothing of the kind is the case. Shelley says—

The human heart has one resource left yet.

But Shelley forgot to think that it is good for the torn heart to bleed, that blood is the tears' best friend for a long time; and that is just when in the midst of remembrance. Such anniversaries, as people soon know, are hollow mocking sunshine meant for the kindly thoughts which they suggest. May we not fancy Thackeray looking down on Christmas holidays when he was, indeed, to take his rest? Some three Januaries when described, in a note to "The Newcomes' Parish Paper," how he took "little Bobby," just returned, full of plum-cake, from school, to see the Pantomime—a day which he records in a sketch of the back of a tall, great man, whom we shall never see again, side by side with little Bobby, who is going to enjoy himself as a stranger approaching to the ankle of Miss Columbine. Then the little boy was taken to the Zoological Gardens; at which time the "Great Unknown" Noah's ark which never could be cut out of a cheesy German round. The bowwow and the bleating bears supplied the "Great Unknown" with tumbrel, and "our dear wombat came up to have his head scratched in his usual affable manner." Thackeray was fond of children but twice this time, but he will soon cease to couple too much sentiment with a festival which is no more be all happiness than it can be all sadness. The name of William Makepeace Thackeray will be synonymous with Christmas five joyously and with a reverent remembrance. It was no part of my duty to say that he was born on the 18th of July, but Miss Landon beautifully says that it is not given to everyone to raise a splendid monument, but "some have strewn early flowers on the grave." With an honest intent, a daisy is as good as a shilling.

Christmas for the year 1863 was a time for all people to be glad. Nothing in the life of the past year became it like the leaving it. It was one of the most economical seasons, perhaps, for the public purse ever known full, except perhaps when the country was turned into a vacuum by everybody going to the Crystal Palace. Fewer moustaches and no imperial, supposed to cover a sinister policy; no "Sea-King" daughter from the south and came for a glimpse of the "Sea-King's daughter from over the sea." Fewer sheep-dogs were seen in the streets, and fewer in the portraits of the Prince of Wales, in every variety of hat and coat; and of Eccentric Jones, with a fluffy terrier under each arm, and of the neighbour Flowerdew's daughters had put together, had never before been seen at one window-pane in all people's lives. And so on: "the thermometer registered last night 3 deg. below freezing-point," as the Daily multi-consistents would say, and so on to the end of the formation, those who are determined to enjoy life relish it all the more for a moderate dash of frost. Frost is a wholesome and makes a glow for others; and that feeling always works in affectionate partnership with trade and plum-pudding. The season has been eminently successful, and that is a joy to the whole country, and a rare provement. Returns of omnibus roofs affirm that never before did they see so many Christmas bubbles standing on the pavements. So, and, indeed, it is said that in Norfolk the turkeys have looked unprecedented as they were driven to the London market, and that

We have taken two hundred and ninety-nine years and eight months before using "spring" cleaning. The Tercentenary, with the constitution of a "national committee" to commemorate the three hundredth birthday of Shakspeare, is a fact. That the committee has become appointed, what it will propose to do, or what it will be, is a question entirely premature, consequently irrelevant. But it is impossible not to recognise the fact that there is a growing public wish, as the time draws near, to see some preparations" will be all to be seen by the 23rd of April next. In the belief, Mr. Hawes, Alderman and Lord Mayor, has addressed various bodies, praying them to operate or co-operate. Well, but the question here—here is a question—is plain enough, and the answer to it should be this: that the country and that London should do what they can to raise a monument to Shakspeare. A monument is the thing wanted. And we will doubtless see the end of it. And, in the meantime, it would be heartless to snub the endeavours of Stratford-on-Avon towards a similar object, and unfriendly to suppose that other places can have their monuments likewise. Shakspeare, like the world, is for all people for all. But, for the sake of all, let the best and generous in man, let the squabbling of the last month cease. There ought to be enough room in the world to commemorate the occasion, raise monuments, or what they please, and there is no need be anxious about one head-quarters; but that London headquarters should enjoy a monopoly of the honour, or that the local government in towns" feeling can bear with patience. On the Burns centenary occasion committees innumerable were formed in provincial towns, and all went merrily as a dinner bell—that being the chief kind of celebrations it, whereas enthusiasm was felt. The Tercentenary, however, something more durable is wanting: and honest Englishmen want to get up to the country expect a Shakspeare memorial of some shape which Taste may assume on the one great subject.

A fatal accident at Tunbridge Wells has cut off the general Englishman at large raving, according to his want. The question raised is, how are the dangers of the domain likely to remain locked or unlocked. We all remember Sydney Smith's observations on this subject twenty years ago, and his aspiration after the sacrifice of the worst-paid Bishop in England to the cause of sanitary and fire security, and promote public safety. Now, as we have done very much for the Bishops of late years, and the Bishops might have some important work to do at times, the blocks might be a little grateful and send us a Bishop. Colenso as an offering, or Hampden as a set off the Great Western at first to get up sufficient confidence, and gradually work himself up to the Bishop of Oxford. Which, I may mean time, it seems that the mere presumption of locking the carriage-door on the inside prevents the traveling public from getting out by means of saving life; but, if that be done, the greatest care should be taken that the key is not lost, or that it is preserved. Total locking in passengers will not endure; but surely a medium treatment can be found.

Englishmen must be wicked in the American eye, and there can be no peace for them or with them. Unhappily, the latest aggravation given comes from our own Government. The Alabama, the 290, the Rappahannock, Confederate States' cruiser, Anything more unhappy, more humiliating, more unnecessary. Of course, it was never intended; but it looks very much as if our great men were so tired after the work of the session, and the excursions in the Medway that there was no more energy amongst them to look after Victors and Rappahannocks. Within a fortnight there will be another supply of the choicest Sewardian scolding, and passionate threats from certain New York organs. And they there will be Lord Russell's reply, and promises, already once broken, never to do the like again. And all this in face of General Grant's standing for the presidency, with a popular "platform," or "ticket," of incomprehensible things. The workmen, said to have been officially employed, are all to be dismissed, nominally for being absent without leave; but, in reality, for having been as careless as Government itself in breaking international laws.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

German Life and Manners as Seen in Saxony. By HENRY MAYHEW. (2 vols. W. H. Allen and Co.) To say that Mr. Henry Mayhew has written two exceedingly entertaining volumes will appear to those who know anything of his writings equivalent only to saying that he has written two volumes. It may, however, be permissible to use the phrase in order to avoid lengthening a notice. We have here very few they may be, who are unacquainted with the author's previous writings. The first volume, "London Labour and London Poor," and the present work, as Saxony offers a specimen of it—and his descriptions are characterized by the same graphic, uncompromising, and, one is bound to say, broad style for which he has hitherto remarkable. They are not, however, to be read, as usual, by grains of wit, humour, and anecdote, and illustrated by comparisons of the author's own with the habits of experience with which his acquaintance with an extensive range of reading has enabled him to do. The work is cast into eleven sections, of which the first treats of "village life, and more particularly that of the Saxon Switzerland." The second of the title of "Dr. Luther family;" the second of "town life in the capital of Thuringia;" the third of "the Saxon Highlands;" the fourth of "life—in fact, the life of "married life;" the sixth is entitled "the beginning and the end of German literature;" the seventh of "the Saxon Court;" the eighth, "ancient life and customs;" the ninth, "legendary life;" the tenth, "the Saxon Lowlands;" and the eleventh, "the Saxon Metropolis" conclusion." It seems odd that nothing should be said about Dresden in a book of this description, especially one on German life; but the explanation is, perhaps, to be found in the fact that the author has made his own inquiries into the early life of Martin Luther; and hence the authors remarks are principally confined to Eisleben and Eisenach. There is, however, more (in our opinion) than enough information given in the "Dr. Luther" section, which is, on the whole, uninproving as anything of the kind can be. Questions of theology, however, are not touched on by the author, whose views upon those and other points it is impossible in a confined space to discuss. Mr. Mayhew, in fact, has not written a book calculated to be satisfactory to Englishmen, and those are the last we have to reason to envy the social conditions of their German brethren, and social condition or their language. Still, even the students of Jena, one would suppose, are not all "Rationalists," as the author would have us write "Vivat Franciscus fratrorum circulus" (vol. ii, pp. 112—117); or to fancy a brawl-house use can be made out of without taking a great liberty with the first syllable of "dicus." Yet the author tells us that "the students are very much addicted to them. In the interest of our advertisers, it may be useful to point how it is that Mr. Mayhew's work is not to be described as a "melancholy" event to kill two birds with one stone. In one case a gentleman who has invented something encouraging the population announces the fact (and an addendum) as follows: "Now that the human race will be wet this day safely delivered of a strong, healthy, boy, Rudolph Bernhardt Schmidt, of a most perfect, spotless piece. A very good long-kept cigar, at 3 groschen the dozen, always on hand." In the other case, a "Dr. Schmidt" has "Pectoral ointment and business —" To those taking part in our service we shall with little or no inconvenience, supply Dr. Schmidt's Pectoral Salve-in-law, the groom, J. G. Brandt, last night, at a quarter past twelve, safely kiss'd his wife, Mrs. Brandt, of a healthy daughter. We respectful announcement that I, the management of my dead father-in-law's gingerbeer and lemonade business, will be found every morning, upon my own and sole account, and under the firm hitherto known as J. G. Brandt, the same as continued." On the whole, Mr. Mayhew draws anything but a pleasing picture of the manners of the Saxons. He visited of Saxony; and many a very face will be pulled by the Saxon when he reads the book.

Tom Brody's Tales. Edited by Mark Lemon. (1 vol. Bradbury and Evans.) We are glad to see that the editorship of Mark Lemon's appearance in his new character of a three-volume novelist, and to congratulate him on the success which has attended the venture in which, it is to please him, he will add fresh laurels to those he has gained in other departments of literature. The tales are stated in the heels of that success" causes a delightful collection of tales by the same pen—every one of which is a gem of its kind, and all of the classical arena scene—and we have nearly as much pleasure in contemplating the humorous illustrations as in the stories, we should observe, are not only full of adventure and of humour, and set up as such, but they are written in such a vein as to be unwelcome, but they are written with much finish, and in a style which shows that the author has studied the best models. The Tercentenary Festival of Shakspeare, just as the case in which the vertex of the triangle is equal to the sum of the two seventh propositions of the first book of "Euclid," needs no demonstration. It was proposed to be held on the 23rd of April, and there is an improvement upon the first. In a very interesting and learned preface Mr. Lemon explains the manner in which he has made, touches upon the late controversy between the Times reviewers and Mr. Collier, and the Cambridge Shakspeare, and goes into some of the questions discussed by the editors. The text, which is printed in double columns, has taking a large part in the dispute, but, if it be not presumptuous to hand so humble a critic as we are, it is difficult to express our surprise at what he says respecting the well-known line—

And Phœbus 'gins arise,
His steeds to water at those springs
On chaliced flowers that lies.

"Where the springs are on flowers," an editor must of necessity follow the old copier; but I cannot think that, except when a rhyme is required, any poet would so offend the character hapless to be speaking, as editor is called upon to offend his common sense by making the steeds moans plural to verbs singular." But how if the verb be not singular, but plural? Mr. Lemon, in a note, observes that "the Old Norse, a Norman attempt at the th characteristic of the third person plural of Anglo-Saxon verbs" We believe that not many of them will be found by a careful study of Spenser and other old poets that no explanation will be found. The Tercentenary Festival is one we have mentioned; and, if it be so, editorial alterations from the (supposed) text of old writers will be made. We hope that they will not be made, of course, pretend to knowledge above Mr. Dyce's, but we venture to think that Mr. Lemon has not given as much attention to the subject, and who kindly pointed out to us the impropriety of speaking of a lawyer's in which he had, in common with the majority of people been living.

English Botany; or, Coloured Figures of British Plants. Edited by Sir William Jackson Hooker. (Vol. ix. Reeve and Co.) Sir William Hinkester. Third Edition, enlarged, rearranged, and entirely revised by John Edward Sowerby, F.L.S., continued by Charles Johnson, and to botany, and indispensable to every botanist. It is impossible to speak highly of the work. The first edition, published in 1790, was a popular portion will be found entertaining, even by the unlearned reader. The Government Department of science, containing and valuable body of illustrative matter. She has explained the origin of the species, and the work cannot be too strongly recommended.

Cartoons from Punch. By John Tenniel. (Bradbury and Evans.) But that all these masterly engravings have been examined and admired in detail by the public, and that almost every one of them has been the talk of the week in which it appeared, the book would create a greater sensation than any artistic work of the time. For each picture presents the grand political "situation" of its day, reproduced in satiric form, or with a felicitous application of some well-known type, and with the caustic pungency of the satire elevated and refined by the graces of art. But the fact is, that every one of these cartoons has been reprinted upon the memory of the public, and therefore, as it were, half admired and half demands that they come to us. Yet, when we begin to examine them in the beautiful guise in which they now appear (not enlarged, but given on toned paper from the original blocks), we discover that these productions were less regarded, at the first production, than the bold and finished style and the vigorous satire. The scholarly thoughtfulness, the faultless drawing, and the delicacy of treatment, which are John Tenniel's acknowledged gifts, are more favourably exemplified now that his designs are transferred to the more sumptuous material. As an artistic treat, a study of this book will have almost unrivalled attraction for the true artist. For the general public the publication will have an additional value. They are an historical gallery, in which the great events of the last few years are chronicled with a fidelity which the hackneyed Horatian lines take care of the "scribbler" to the other name. The whole struggle, and of all our own domestic affairs, are here reflected with a vigour and with uniformity satire of Punch is illustrated in the most copious variety. The portraits of the princess, the Angel of Peace, the "Britannia and her companion Columbia" (when the Trent affair was at its height), the "Britannia" (at the old time of the "British Lion's Vengeance on the Bengal Tiger," the "Session of Sovereigns," and numerous others would suffice to give the artist's reputation for life; but there are nimbers of others only second in merit, and not inferior in point of wit. Of the latter class, we may add hundreds to the collection. The book, we may fairly say, is a necessity in a house which has not already the best kind which we possess—many of them more extensive than the Queen's, or German and Prince—pass from the father to eldest son, while the junior connections will be content with the smaller editions of the Peerage and Baronetage, work their way to wealth and honour where industry, talent, and character lay the road open to success. The "Dictionary of Universal Biography" is indeed an important repertorium of the leading commoners of Great Britain and Ireland.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

IF Madme. La Mode were the sensitive creature she is sometimes represented, the fact of the French Court being in mourning for his Majesty Queenhood of Portugal, would have combined with the general occasioned by the hesitation of many of the Powers to assist at the Emperor's programme Congress, to upset the plans of the fashion-writer with somebody in the coming spring, might be expected to experience a certain amount of gloom. The Paris Fashions for the New Year. But even grief, anxiety, and rumour combined are not capable of producing any important effect upon the fou fleur of French society—do not penetrate the mission of the gold thread.

After all, with a few exceptions, the winter toilets already put forth announce a splendour and richness which will make the Court of the French Empire. Rich satins and brocaded silks of Lyons manufacture are the distinguishing marks of long promenade dress. The richest materials, especially when plain in colour, are ordinarily worn with little or no trimming. Velvet is, however, considered indispensable for these exceptional stuffs is passementerie, the ever-indispensable accommodative trimming of the dressmaker sale, let it be remembered that several descriptions of ornament, although not actually composed of passementerie, nevertheless belong to it as others, the trimming of feathers, the queen of trimmings. But it is not to be neglected, as many of the ladies' worth being required for decorating a redonde or a paletot, the two gardeuses of the day. Redonde is generally made of velvet, trimmed with fur, or with lace or passementerie, as just mentioned; or in plush with passementerie to match the fringe. For the Opera or for ceremonial dinners, the white lace shawl is considered indispensable. It will fully explain how that in black lace is also useful as the complement of a more simple toilet, and serves to soften the effect of grace and elegance.

The Paris chapeaux have undergone but little change for the inauguration of the new year. The toque is still high in front, and the ornamentation, to which there is no limit but the taste of the fair wearer, is composed of velvet; pink, blue, and white satin, with soft crowns, are the materials of the most distinguish.

A word or two anent the coiffures de ces dames, and we bring our Paris fashion article to a close. One of the Christian era to a close. One of our illustrations shows the most recent style of headdress, and the manner in which the hair is directed backwards. The beauty of hair worn in bandeaux, whether natural or false-haired, and the extreme especially should be very thick. A goodly amount of hair is required for the Grecian bend. "If you have not sufficient, purchase some," says Madame. There is not even much advantage in possessing a fine head of hair if the wearing of such dresses is so generally admitted and permitted, that ladies sufficiently rich in the capillary ornament are obliged to have recourse to artificial aid in the fashionable importation, which is not considered in the least derogatory to the wearer's beauty or fashion.

The latest novelty in the way of cups occupies a corner of our Engraving. In form is round, the materials being a combination of tulle ornamented with violet satin bows and ribbons.

According to the Swedish journals, more than one half of the town of Salmar, one of the largest in Oelund, has been destroyed by fire.

The National Shakespeare Committee has, during the past week, been increased by the addition to it of the following new members :—The Lord Provost of Edinburgh, the Provost of Stirling, the Mayor of Kendal, the Mayor of Northampton, the Recorder of Durham, the Chief Justice of British Guiana, Sir Rowland Hill, and others.

The Board of Trade returns for November furnish additional evidence of the prosperous condition of the commerce of the United Kingdom, considered as a whole. The exports for the month exceeded in value those of the corresponding month of last year by £1,200,000; and, taking the eleven months ending November last, we find, as compared with the corresponding period of 1862, an improvement of close upon £30,000,000.

MUSIC.

On Christmas Eve a performance of "The Messiah" was given at Her Majesty's Theatre under the direction of Signor Arditi, the solo performers being Mdlle. Titiens, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Santley. Signor Arditi's task was no easy one, and he deserves great credit for the efficient state of the band and chorus. The orchestra was excellent, and although there were some perceptible shades of difference amongst the members of the choir, on the whole, they acquitted themselves well. Mdlle. Titiens sang as gloriously as ever. Her voice is quite unimpaired by the hard work she has gone through during the past year, and is as fresh, pure, and brilliant as ever. Mr. Santley sang splendidly, and Mr. Cooper greatly; and "I know that my Redeemer liveth" elicited most enthusiastic applause—the great power and beauty of his voice ever resisting the re-demand. This was the last appearance of Mdlle. Titiens previous to her departure to fulfil her engagements in Russia, and it is to be hoped will not be a very long duration. Miss Lascelles, although evidently unwell, sang with much feeling and beauty of voice; and Mdlle. Santley and Mr. Wilbye Cooper, to their great satisfaction, the former gentleman obtaining an encore in "Why do the nations?" The chorus was also encored in "For unto us," as anticipated.

The annual meeting of the London Cambrian Society was held at the Store-street Concert Rooms on Saturday evening last, and attracted a numerous attendance. The large room was decorated with specimens of sculpture, busts of celebrities, Welsh paintings, and various other works of art, giving the room more the appearance of an elegant drawing-room, in lieu of the dreary and monotonous aspect of ordinary concert-rooms. The programme consisted principally of vocal music, and was performed by members of the members of the society, sang several Welsh airs, from Mr. John Thomas's collection, and, for the first time, a new part-song, by Mr. Brinley Richards, called the "Harp of Wales," which was given with rare effect and precision. It is characteristic and will be frequently be heard again. Mr. Lewis Thomas sang the "March of the Hawkins Men," with great success, and in the first part of the song the audience joined in the chorus with the audacious. Miss Eliza Hughes and other ladies contributed various solos, and the harp performances of Mr. Apthomas and Mr. Elias Rogers were encored. The most remarkable feature of the evening was the evasive playing, by Mr. Brinley Richards, of a fantasia introduced on several Welsh airs. The novelty of it caused the audience as to cause him to be recalled. The secretary apologized for the unavoidable absence of the chairman, Lord Aberdare, and made the usual statement in reference to its progress. Mr. Brinley Richards, Mr. Lloyd Ellis the Rev. Rees Pryse, and others, and by Mr. Lewis Thomas and the members of the choir, brought the evening's entertainment to a conclusion. Mr. Aptomas, the well-known sculptor, acted as conductor, and acquitted himself with much judgment, and the arrangements generally reflect credit on the committee.

Relying on the attraction of the pantomime, the management of the Royal Queen's Opera have produced a new opera for the season for Christmas. We sincerely hope the liberality and taste displayed in the production of the pantomime will be rewarded by a full succession of crowded houses. A new operetta, entitled "Zucchetto," is embellished by Signor Arditi, and produced at the Queen's. In it Miss Louise Pyne and Mr. Harrison will make their reappearance.

THE THEATRES.

PANTOMIMES AND BURLESQUES.

We have already given such outlines of the pantomimes and burlesques of the season as could be rendered during their rehearsal, and have now to add the performances, as they have been given to circulars of individual excess and the degree in which they have been accepted by the discriminating public. We begin with the Queen's.

Covent Garden.—Here flourishes English opera. Accordingly, the performances commenced with Balfe's Bohemian Girl. Miss Pyne came the pantomime, "St. George and the Dragon." The name of Baghdad's pattern saint is much over be a mistake, and in or out of the nursery. Mr. Byrom has kept tolerably close to the original story, but the neglecting of fitting opportunities for embellishment is, we think, we met with Messrs. W. H. Payne and F. Payne among the able artists who have undertaken the opening scene. The dragon of St. George, the Dragon was represented by Mr. J. Rouse. Miss Annie Collinson as the Princess Sarah, Mr. Fox as Prince Ali, Mr. Dragon (of which we attest all illustration) leads to the transformation scene, the principal being by the Ball Master, who has not enjoyed the public with its beauty, and commanded the unanimous applause of the house. The whole plan is that a number of fairies and before the walls on both sides the knight is lined with mounted cavaliers and pages, the armour adding much to the effect of the display. The pantomime company is strong. Mdlle. Esther is Columbine; Mr. John Parselle, Pantaloon; Mr. Harry Payne, Clown; Mr. Ben Herring, Pantaloon; and the Brothers Bicnette, Sprites. The audience was numerous, and part of the house was filled with juvenile visitors, the getting-up was excellent, and due credit to the care and skill of the stage-manager, Mr. Edward Stirling.

Drury Lane.—The subject of "Sinbad the Sailor" is treated by Mr. E. L. Blanchard in his usual skilful manner. We may state at once that the pantomime has been placed on the stage in a more complete mess that far exceeded our previous experience. On every scene Mr. Beverley has exerted the peculiarity of his talent. The Valley of Diamonds and the Pyramids was remarkable enough; but the second, the vestibule of the Nile, was magnificent. It represented an old cataract of real water, with a moon that looked a live one, shedding poetic light on the grey granite and the mysterious shades of enchantment that was rapturously applauded by an overflowing audience. But there was something finer than all this, and that was Mr. Cormack's troupe of dancers, the maidens of the Nile, who descended the rocks in countless numbers, and then figured in a grand ballet of exceedingly picturesque character. The scene was, for evening for a demonstration; but the audience were impervious, and Mr. Beverley had brought forward all his resources in vain. Miss Williams exacted Sinbad, whose appearance in the Valley of Diamonds was at least interesting. Delivered from the dragon by the enormous Roc, whose wings filled the serial space (as shown in our Engraving), and whose feathers are composed of the plumes of the Dwards, who would eat both him and the nefarious captain who has subjected him to servitude, and with the Roc of Miss Kate Vaughan, acted by Master Percy Roselle. This ball's performance was a perfect gem, and will rank greatly in the repertoire of the management. By was deservedly recalled to receive the congratulations of the audience. Miss Vaughan was equally entombed as a performer, and is very young. The transformation scene was extremely grand and "beautiful exceedingly," with its stalactites and its female divinities, glittering and graceful, and Beverley emblematic of the management to which we have already stated in a previous Number, was worked by a double company, whose names have been read out by Mr. Blanchard. Falconer and Chatterton have achieved a great success with their pantomime, the popularity of which will be long and unquestioned.

Haymarket.—Mr. Sothern returned to this theatre on Saturday, and appeared in "Our American Cousin," which, as a revised edition of the comedy, for it has been re-placed on the boards in a greatly altered condition. Our readers are acquainted with the distinctions must, however, be deferred to some other occasion. What we have now to do with is Mr. Byron's pantomime, entitled "King Arthur; or, the Days and Knights of the Round Table." With a pun in the title, we may well expect many puns in the text. Mr. Tilbury, as we have already said, is Merlin, and appears among the old Druidical ruins of Stonehenge, a scene especially painted by Mr. O'Connor, presenting the rising sun over the sea and reflected upon the enormous masses of stone which compose the temple. Here Arthur (Miss Louise Keeley) draws the magic sword from a stone in which it is imbedded, and which has withstood the efforts of the other competitors for the throne. Merlin the enchantress (Mr. Clarke), conspires with Cheldric, the Saxon invader (Mr. Rogers), to subdue Arthur by magic. We related in our last Number how Vivien (Miss Romer) interfered with Merlin's proceedings, and, having gained the enchanter's confidence, Arthur, whose wanderings in the Enchanted Forest are full of danger. This scene is charmingly set. Resigning himself to repose, Arthur is visited by fairies, who hear him away. Messrs. O'Connor and Morris are the artists of this exquisite scene. This is succeeded by a scene in the wood, (for which see our illustration) with waterfalls and rocks, and exciting combat between a bullet, in which Miss Fanny Wright executes a pas de fascination. Guinevere, Arthur's Queen, has been carried off by Cheldric, and Sir Lancelot (Miss Lindley) resolves upon her rescue, but fails. The next scene is Vesta Arthur and the Knights before the Castle of Cheldric demanding the surrender of the Queen, which is refused. A battle ensues, a strong man (Mr. Cox), referee; but the latter, who has been overthrown in the combat by Sir Lancelot, rises, and, with his band, swears to do service to the latter, surrenders at his demand and removes the flag from the castle. Here is a splendid scene, by Mr. O'Connor, in which the captive Queen is bound. Here, again, we have a finely-painted scene, the effect of which is heightened by the appearance of the knights in armour. Then comes the final display—certainly a grand one—by Beverley, which is the transformation scene, presided over by the Spirit of Chivalry. Mr. Chippendale inserts much commendation for his services in this scene, which abounds in picturesque arrangements. The music accompanying the piece has been composed and arranged by Mr. Frederick Evans, and was very effective.

Princess's.—"The Honeymoon," reduced to one acts, was the first piece on Saturday and showed an addition to the company of Mr. Frank Matthews, Miss Heath, Miss Ada Swanborough, Mr. Rouse and Miss Caroline Carson. This was followed by Mr. Greenwood's pantomime, entitled "Little Bo-Peep and her Sheep; or, the Fine Lady of Banbury Cross, and the Old Woman who lived in a Shoe, and had so many Children she did not know what to do." The fun, jokes and its contents our readers may gain some notion by referring to our illustration. Here was a fine melange and which to furnish incidents; and the drama with this lengthy title has an immense variety of amusing matter. The transformation scene was a "Midsummer," Mary, quite contraire," and "Old King Cole." But on these points we have already taken account in our last Number. The transformation scene represents a grotto, in which the sea washes, with floating nymphs in nautilus shells, which gradually changes, becoming more and more brilliant, until the whole is a mass of light which must be witnessed to be appreciated. Lloyd, the artist, received for the transformation scene, and the whole of the pantomime generally is excellent, and there is some extraordinary machinery which is due to the cleverness of Mr. Lloyd. The pantomime company was the comic business introduced, were good. The pantomime company was judiciously selected. Miss Leclercq was Bo-Peep; Mr. Paul, Sir Caroline Adams was Columbine, Mr. Charles Leclercq and Mr. and Master Hudson were for two Dromios, Mr. Fred Vokes as Mr. Saylor was Pantaloon. Mr. Vining may congratulate himself on the success of his pantomime.

New Adelphi.—A burlesque fairy drama, by Mr. Byron, adapted from one of the Counters d'Aroia' popular stories, under the title of "The Lady Bein Penn; or, the Fairy Spell," is the bill at New Adelphi, forms the entertainment for festival folk at this house. The elderly heroine is represented by Mr. Paul Bedford, and Mr. Fox Clarke, late of the Strand Theatre, who was greatly applauded on his entry, as Fire Dragon of the Seven Seas, is also a favourite. The scenery is good, and the costumes are excellent, and there is some extraordinary machinery which is due to the cleverness of Mr. Lloyd. Sadler's Wells.—This house was crowded in every part to witness Mr. Charlton's pantomime, entitled "The Prince of Peculiar Islands," which went off without a single hitch. The opening is full of merit; but much of its effect was due to Miss Marie Davis's acting, who performed Prince Exquisite. Many of the songs and parodies were encored. The ballet portion was remarkably effective. Everything, in fact, had been completely rehearsed, and the result was in the highest degree satisfactory. The beautiful scenery was painted by Mr. James Egerton, which delighted the audience. The transformation scene presented "The Opal Throne of the Amazonian Queen in the Golden Hall of Pendulum Court," and is one of the most powerful conceived by the artist. The comic business was well applied. Mr. Charlton, Mr. George Beckett, Miss Bessie Wells, Miss Attorwell Columbine, and Mr. W. Lucy Pantaloon. This pantomime will go far to secure the prosperity of Mr. Charlton's management.

Surrey.—The pantomime at this house, connected with the adventures of "Jullanus and Basilisa," is one of the most grotesque ladies ever placed on the stage. Crotoe and his man Friday, as acted by Miss Ida Jarman, Mr. Lawrence and Mr. Lupino, are most efficient characters; and Miss Laura Conquest, as the Fear of Fun, is a most fetching little lady. The dancer and a singer. The transformation scene is brilliant, and is appropriately named "The Glittering Realm of Gems, leading to the Dewdrop Palace," ending with a triumphant tableau, by the artist, Mr. Morris, the artist, displaying the ingenuous reception of the audience. The pantomimists are all clever. Clown, Mr. Wilkins; Pantaloon, Mr. H. Power; Harlequin, Mr. Wilkins; Harlequin, Mr. W. Osmond; and Columbine, Miss Darling and Miss Taylor. The piece throughout is a great success.

Marylebone.—The pantomime of "Jolly King Christmas" at this house is an excellent specimen of the pantomimic drama, and is got up in a really brilliant style. The transformation scene, called "The Crystal Palace of the Genius of Peace," passes through a series of scenes which are truly bewildering. Mr. J. W. Lawrence is Clown, Mr. C. Cooper Pantaloon, Mr. Frank Vokes Harlequin, Miss Jesse Vokes Columbine, and Mr. F. Vokes Pierrot.

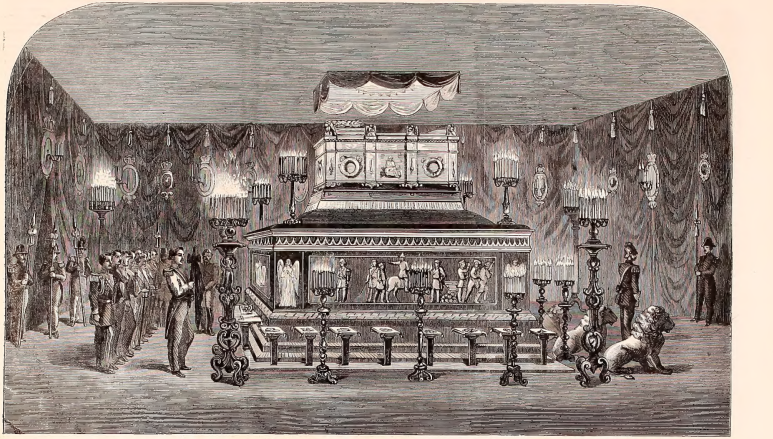
Pavilion.—The title of the pantomime here is, "Prince and Lion King; or, Harlequin Lion Tamer, and the Fairy Queen of Precious Stones," and is really a brilliant affair. The Harlequin is Mr. Arthur Roby; the Clown, Mr. Gladstone; the Pantaloon, Mr. H. Clifton; Queen and Columbine, Miss Louisa Elliston.

City of London.—"Jack and Jill and the Comical Cat" is one of Mr. Nelson Lee's best pantomimes. For scenery and mechanical effect it has been highly commended. The pantomimists are—Harlequin, Mr. George Lupino; Columbine, Mdlle. Lupino; Pantaloon, Master Lupino; Clown, Mr. Thomas Matthews. The house is crowded.

Sydney.—Mr. Shepherd gets up a pantomime as well as any man living, and his "Old King Cole" will bear comparison with his previous efforts. Miss Lee's tenor was remarkably fine, particularly the Vale of Dreams with the ballet impersonations very brilliant. The transformation scene is indescribably gorgeous. The Harlequinade is rich in fun. The Clown was Clown, Mr. C. Parker Pantaloon, Mr. Frederick Evans Harlequin, and Miss Annie Vokes Columbine, and the whole was numerously attended and the piece decidedly successful.

Victoria.—This house, which, under a new management, has of late much improved, produced a successful pantomime, entitled "Lucifer and the Fairy of the Golden Dancers; or, Harlequin and the Genius of Discord."

Polytechnic.—This institution had, as usual, its pantomime. It was constructed on the old tale of "Beauty and the Beast," The costumes and scenery are very handsome, and the dissolving effects, too, have been added, in order to exhibit the improvements on Professor Pepper's patent, by which the facilities of such spiritual exhibitions are rendered perfect. The libretto, descriptive of the pantomime, was well read by Mr. Millard. Mr. Pepper also delivers his very useful lecture on the steam engine, which turns many a penny. As this lecture is practically illustrated, the excitement it produces is extraordinary. The pantomime is explained on Professor Pepper's principles. The current between an electricity and other scientific subjects are all attractive, because the explanations are given as well as the facts. The institution has of late become increasingly popular, and has now before it undoubtedly a most prosperous career.



Agricultural Hall.—This spacious building at Islington has grown at once into great popularity. Although not specially adapted to any purpose, it has already been used for a great variety of entertainments. On Boxing Day, and on Messrs. Sanger's behalf, those who have speculated on an equestrian entertainment, including other varieties combined, in fact, a monster exhibition. On Saturday there were two performances, one in the afternoon and the other in the evening. The latter was so crowded that the doors had to be closed, and thousands of people were turned away. The afternoon audience was by no means small, the persons in the hall. The hippodrome is constituted of a moveable circus, which fills the building. Altogether, the performers are engaged. To describe all they do would exhaust columns. Suffice it to say that they turn somersaults in the air, nearly a hundred times without touching the ground. The performing animals are also astonishing. There is Mr. Crockett with his loose, which, it would appear, he rules by gentleness and not by mental coercion or physical force. The Roman scene is terribly interesting. We must not omit to mention the classical scene in the arena, which were most effective. The performance concludes with a grand tournament, on a larger scale than that at Cremorne. In the galleries and other convenient parts of the building refreshments and other requisites are provided, there are places where toys for children and Christmas trees may be obtained at reasonable prices. There is a great room on patronage. Messrs. Strange and Pulleyn's equestrian entertainment must be an immense success.

Other places of amusement have likewise had their share of success, and in no other country but our own could the holiday week spread this Christmas. The Crystal Palace had on Saturday 43,741 visitors. The Zoological Gardens, Regent's Park, was crowded, and numerously attended. Mdme. Tussaud's maintained also its popularity; indeed, there was not a place of public resort which did not some fortune destiny attended the Alhambra, which was visited by deputations. Mr. Charles Coyte's Circus Royal, which is exceedingly good, will increase in favour with the public.

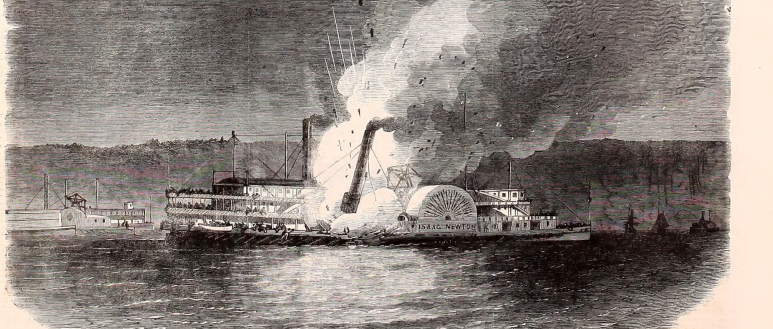
Reappearance of the Sun in 1864.—Next year there will be two eclipses of the sun. The first will be on the 5th of May. It will begin on the earth at 8 h. 20 m. 30 s. p.m., Greenwich time, in lat. 39 deg. 30 min. N., long. 20 deg. 21 min. of south latitude. It ends on the earth on the following day at 1 h. 44 m. 30 s. a.m., in lat. 39 deg. 30 min. west, and 10 deg. 21 min. north latitude. The total eclipse will be visible only in the North Pacific Ocean, and it will be visible as a partial eclipse in a part of Europe, the eastern most part of North America and the north of Australia. The second eclipse of the sun will be on the 29th of October. It will be on the earth at 1 h. 21 m. London time, in longitude 169 deg. 14 min. west of Greenwich, and in lat. 39 deg. 30 min. south. It ends at 5 h. 39 m. 30 s. p.m., in longitude 6 deg. 38 min. west, and in lat. 39 deg. 30 min. south. This eclipse will be visible as a total eclipse passes across South America, between 20 deg. and 40 deg. of south latitude. It will also be visible in the South Pacific and South Atlantic Oceans. A partial eclipse will be visible for a short time in the Atlantic Ocean, on the west coast of Africa, and in part for a few moments other countries, and at the latter just before sunset.

Patterns for Ladies.—The Postmaster-General has issued an order, to take effect on and after the 1st of January —Patterns of merchandize, &c., may be sent by parcel post between the United Kingdom and places in the United Kingdom at colonial rates, may be transmitted by post between England and Canada, by Canadian mail packet, at the following rates of postage, which must in all cases be prepaid by means of postage-stamps— viz., 4 oz., 3d.; under 8 lb., 6d.; under 1 lb., 1s.; under 2 lb., 2s.; and not exceed 3 lb., 3s.; every additional 1 lb., 1s. No packet of patterns must exceed two feet in length, two feet in breadth, and one foot in thickness. It must be open at the ends, so as to be easy of examination. Samples, however, of seeds, drugs, and so forth, which cannot be sent in open covers, may be included in the packet of patterns, provided that the packet itself must be capable of being opened for examination, even although they be transparent, must not be used for that purpose.

LYING IN STATE OF THE REMAINS OF THE LATE KING OF DENMARK IN THE CASTRUM DOLORIS, OR MOURNERS' HALL, AT THE ROYAL PALACE, COPENHAGEN.

LYING IN STATE OF THE LATE KING OF DENMARK.



THE sarcophagus containing the remains of the late King Frederick VII. was publicly exhibited in the Castrum Doloris, or Mourners' Hall, at the Royal Palace, Copenhagen, from the 10th to the 17th ult., from ten till two and from four till six. In this spacious hall the dead King received the visits of his mourning subjects. Along the staircase and in the corridors they walked between waving folds of black cloth, lit up by the solemn lustre of numerous girandoles. In the middle of the room stood the catafalque. An open coffin of enormous dimensions, encasing two others of lead and wood, was placed on a platform, decorated with black, like the rest of the hall. At its head drooped the grand banner of the realm. A bas-relief in bronze, inlaid in the wood on the left side, exhibited the late King on horseback, giving orders to sailors and soldiers; whilst on the right he was represented as the protector of art and science. The steps leading up to the sarcophagus were studded with twenty-four diminutive pedestals, bearing the insignia of Royalty, the sceptre, and the various orders of knighthood belonging to the deceased Sovereign. Partly on and partly round the Castrum Doloris were placed silver candelabra, radiant with lights; whilst the foot of the catafalque was guarded by three silver lions, which are always produced on similar occasions in Denmark. Over the whole a canopy of black crape spread out its sombre folds. Besides the bas-reliefs already mentioned, and others illustrating the love and sorrow of his people, the sarcophagus bore a silver plate, containing the following inscription:—

"Frederick VII., born Oct. 6, 1808. Married, first, Nov. 1, 1828, to Princess Wilhelmina Marie, of Denmark; second, June 10, 1841, to Princess Caroline, of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; married by the left hand, Aug. 7, 1850, to Lady Christina Louisa, Countess of Danner. He restored the popular liberties of Denmark, and boldly defended the independence of the realm. He was the last male of the line of King Frederick III., and, with the approbation of his people, elected as his successor the husband of his father's sister's daughter, the son of his grandfather's sister's daughter. He died Nov. 15, 1863, when the Prince elect ascended the throne as Christian IX. His motto was, 'The love of the people is the strength of my reign.'"

On the lid was placed a golden wreath, the tribute of some Danish ladies; whilst the frame of the sarcophagus was inlaid with silver plates, containing appropriate texts from the treasures of the Old and New Testaments. A magnificent coat of arms, suspended on the wall, together with the armorial bearings of the various provinces, completed the decoration of the chamber. High military and civil officers and twelve yeomen of the guard surrounded the platform.

BURNING OF THE AMERICAN RIVER-STEAMER ISAAC NEWTON.

THE Isaac Newton, one of the most elegant of the many floating palaces on the Hudson River, while on her way from New York to Albany, caught fire near Fort Washington, from the bursting of one of her boilers, on Saturday, the 5th ult., and was burnt to the water's edge. All attempts to extinguish the flames proved unavailing. It was impossible, owing to the dense smoke and steam on the lower deck, to get at the hose, and the heat drove the engineer from his post. The Isaac Newton had on board, at the time of the accident, about 130 passengers. A tug and a propeller hastened to the relief of those on board, who were speedily removed from the burning wreck. Fourteen persons were, however, badly scalded by the steam, and of these six died. Our Engraving is from a sketch taken by Mr. Edward L. Henry, of Tenth-street, New York.

SKETCHES FROM MEXICO.

THE two accompanying Mexican Illustrations are from sketches sent through the last mail by our artist, M. Beaucé, who is now at General Bazaine's head-quarters in the Mexican capital. From his long association with the French army, and his peculiar position as the official painter of the events of the Mexican war, M. Beaucé has become quite a favourite with the officers, with whom he messes à la militaire. Our Artist arrived at Vera Cruz at the same time as the Archbishop of Mexico—and, in his amusing letter just received, relates that he had the honour of proceeding to Puebla in his Eminence's company. The representatives of Religion and the Arts performed their agreeable journey to Puebla on mule-back, and were escorted throughout their tortuous course by a detachment of fifty Spahis.

According to most accounts, the state of things in the portions of Mexico under French domination is satisfactory. The most recent military fact of importance is the occupation of Jalapa, which was given up to the Imperial troops by a Mexican General who has espoused the cause of the Empire. The name of the General in question is Prieto. He has since returned with his officers to Puebla, his ordinary abode, to complete their submission to the French authorities.

In the capital the Regency continues its labours for the organisation of the Mexican army, in accordance with the regulations of the French military system. The General-in-Chief superintends all the ameliorations with much interest. The city of Mexico has recovered most of its habits of luxury and elegance. General Bazaine, General Almonte, and the Archbishop have held receptions worthy of their position; and when the courier left preparations were being made for a grand fête about to be offered by the ayuntamiento to the officers of the two armies. The effect produced by these reunions is excellent, not only on account of the impulse they give to business, but also because they afford opportunities for friendly communication between persons of different parties.

The only real trouble to which the Imperial troops are still exposed arises from the existence of a few corps of Juarez's partisans, who usually disperse on the approach of the French military, or from bands of professional robbers, who are, of course, the natural enemies of all solid military organisation, which must inevitably lead to their suppression. With the extension of the French influence these bands of robbers are obliged to withdraw for their personal safety to regions that offer but rare and unprofitable occasions for the exercise of their rapacious talent; and even in the haunts selected by the master chiefs they are occasionally disturbed and captured by the flying detachments of contre-guerrillas that scour the environs of Puebla, Mexico, and Vera Cruz.

Our first illustration is a Portrait of Bauuelos José de Jésus, for many years one of the scourges of the country, and a veritable type of the Mexican brigand chiefs. He was forty years of age, and on his trial was accused of assassination, pillage, and arson. He was found guilty on all these serious counts. Arrested on Wednesday, the 14th of October, and tried on the 16th, he was shot at Puebla on the 17th of the same month, at eight o'clock in the morning.

Our other illustration relates to the capture of sixteen brigands, recently tried by court-martial at Puebla; they formed part of Quesada's famous band. For the exercise of their predatory functions they were well mounted and well armed, and did not lack a certain amount of boldness. They had made an attack upon San Andre, but were repulsed with loss. From a sentiment of vengeance they afterwards pillaged Jalapasco, and subsequently attacked and burnt the hacienda of San Antonio d'Arco. Such atrocities led to their vigorous pursuit by the French detachments, and the sixteen rascals were at length arrested in San Antonio, and sent for trial to Puebla. Seven of them were condemned to death on the 18th of October, and were shot at eight o'clock the following morning. The remaining nine were sentenced to hard labour for life. The scene of the court-martial represented in our Engraving is the reading of the sentence.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

THE West Riding of Yorkshire is an important section of our great Parliamentary system. Its importance is a political sense has often been exhibited by the fact that the results of elections for the county have been considered as the turning-point of hard-fought party battles. Since the time when the Whigs were beaten out of the county representation, and Mr. Cobden ceased to be one of the members for the West Riding, it has formed a well-defined phalanx of Conservatism, and the north has awfully dwindled away. New men, whose qualifications are admitted to be territorial and unexceptionable, have respectively quietly walk into the representation, and hold it, without, apparently any record of leaders' names. As it is said that members out of Parliament has added two more members to the West Riding; and as it is well believed that the Conservatives, under the management of Mr. Collins, mean to have Sir Francis Lindley and another formidable preparations for an attempt on the two seats at the next general election, the West Riding seems likely to be a political demonstration from a liberal point of view, in the hope of raising the dormant spirit of party, and baffling the plans of the Conservatives. Accordingly, there came together at Leeds the other day most of the liberal members for the West Riding, and those who were not there knew them all will probably think that, in a certain peculiar and mainly physical sense, the collection was a full one. It was a meeting of the affair, as we suspect, and of course at the top of the table, was Lord Houghton, and Mr. Macaulay. Mr. Macaulay is the only public bushes of the honours of the Peerage upon him, thus took the earliest opportunity of infringing on the constitutional principle that Peers must not interfere in Parliamentary elections, Parliamentary assemblage, and the way in which Lord Houghton talked, there can be no doubt that he would electioneering. Mr. Macaulay, Sir John Ramsden, senior member for the West Riding, a Denham young statesman, who, we think, is Lord Ashburton's heir, and blue and first of the political and official atmosphere, got his wings singed in 1846, were of course present, and also of course, were jovial, boldly. And did his best to hide the aforesaid slightly-damaged wings. There was one gap in the assemblage, and that was Cowsley, who always reminds one of a statue of some Parliamentary hero. We have come to this conclusion on account, no doubt, felt pleasantly on the cars of his Yorkshire hearers, and which sound so oddly on the unattuned ear of the Londoner on the occasion when he is not in the representation at critical moments of debate, which declare his principle to be, 'let us have cheap government, whatever else we have not.' Mr. Macaulay's eloquence Mr. Lenthall, who is always so pointed and so neat, and so modish and mercurial, that he is the very model of a modern political maître-d'œuvre, who skips and stamps about, threatening with his light but firm fingers every point he touches, and who is a great favourite. How capital he must be in Yorkshire (where he has his audience with him) when he even condescends to interest us in London, as he does is by no means with him. Then there was Mr. Dent, who has sat for Knaresborough ever since the Reform Parliament, which is all that we are able to say, even if we are threatened with the consequences of our ignorance; and Mr. Henry Thompson, who, great grand nephew to the special position of a Yorkshire M.P. and by no means least in our dear love, was Mr. Edward Baines, who, being in Yorkshire, was sure to be there. A man of the most determined views of Radicalism pure and simple, actually took on himself at the Leeds dinner the task of a Tory. The Heroe of the Dissenters was in attendance to a time which Lord Houghton himself could not have made sweeter or more appropriate. Lastly, but not least, there was the member of wile, and with the intention of repeating the Tories hark way upon their own ground, by the way, we are sorry to say, he has been a good Conservation talked at this Liberal demonstration, and Mr. Cuthbert Cuth talked. Cuth talked.

In the course of these meaningless commonplaces on extra-Parliamentary utterances, it has not hitherto been our fortune to encounter Sir Joseph Paxton. Perhaps he is not, by the way, a member of the Conservation of Coventry—which has replaced, so far as its representation is concerned, the old Whig-Radical city of Coventry—but as the Sebastopol-Tortoise gone mad, and what that means the initiated alone can understand. Sir Joseph has, however, given us a most pleasant discourse with his constituents. Somehow or the other, one cannot help thinking that Sir Joseph has been in the full eclipse of late. The Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1852 were wise enough not to recognise the Paxton of original genius; and, large crystal buildings having been rather ignored than not, Sir Joseph, like the Almanack, found most of his hopes of fame upon glass, has not been flourished in the face of the world as he was in the days of 1851. Perhaps he is satisfied with his great Parliamentary seat of compiling the Times' Index, and has resolved to accept his scheme of the embankment of the Thames; and he may even have been consulted about the Nile dam, and we hope that there be blushes unseen as much as possible at finding himself so famous. If we were Sir Joseph, having to make a Parliamentary speech, a specimen of a peculiar class of Parliamentary men—those who, essentially of the people, have risen from the people to be men of political character, but to whom representing a constituency is the natural climax of their good fortune, who do their work in the house in a quiet, easy, but, on the whole, satisfactory manner, we should decidedly go ourselves the pleasure of introducing him to Sir Joseph Paxton.

To those who have extended their observation and inquiry to the more remote regions of the house—to those who have attended occasionally with the study of little-known, or unknown members—to the Radicals, best interpreted by Mr. Hume, and to the members for Oldham. His hereditary name has done little for him as a member of Parliament; and, indeed, he has done considerably for him in the wrong way; while a peculiar sensitiveness of temperament, and, as we think, genuine modesty of character, have been very much in the back ground so far as the showy part of membership is concerned. But there is growing upon him what we think is more respected than he. Entertaining opinions founded on a deep sympathy with the working classes of the country, and championing always the cause of humanity towards the brute creation, Mr. Hindley shows a melancholy earnestness in the cause he espouses which would render it a more effective speaker if he would. His earnestness was not so deeply tinged with melancholy. It may not be so; but Mr. Colborne also is a man of deep feeling, and his melancholy grief until sorrow has become absorbed into his nature, and that the only evidence that he has against it is the fact that he himself as largely as possible the griefs of others. A neat, easy, fluent speaker, with a well-considered subject, Mr. Colborne will come an air of apology for obtruding his sadness on the House. besides being fluent—few words in a sentence always speaks under circumstances to induce attention—he really speaks with great feeling in the House of Commons more than he ever dreams of. We have an impression that on general subjects he is a reader of notes oddly sometimes; but we are sure that by the electors of Oldham, whom he has been peculiarly solemnly true, he is high esteem as one who sympathises with because he knows them.

A crime similar to that committed by the notorious Palmer is the subject of judicial investigation in Paris. A physician learned the life of his wife for 100,000f. (£4000), and, according to the charge, he and his accomplice the young woman died. The coldeness of the death and the large amounts for which the life was insured excited the attention of the directors of the insurance company, and they determined to make the case known to the proper authorities. The Commissioners of Police are now under the direction of the Imperial Attorney-General, in consequence of which the affair was examined and committed to the Assizes.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERALSHIP OF INDIA.—At a time when the circumstances of India in connection with the appointment of Lord Lowerence to the post of Governor-General are exciting attention, the following list of eminent persons who have filled that important position since the Battle of Plassy, with the dates of their appointments, may prove interesting:—Colonel Clive, 1759; Mr. Holwell, 1760; Mr. Vansittart, 1761; Mr. Spencer, 1764; Lord Clive, 1765; Mr. Verelst, 1767; Mr. Cartier, 1769; Mr. Warren Hastings, 1772; Sir J. McPherson, 1785; Earl (Marquis) Cornwallis, 1786; Lord Teignmouth (Sir J. Shore), 1793; the Earl (Marquis) of Wellesley, 1798; Lord Minto, 1807; Marquis Hastings, 1813; G. Barlow, 1805; the Earl of Minto, 1807; Earl Moira (Marquis of Hastings), 1813; Earl Amherst, 1823; Lord W. Bentinck, 1828; Sir C. Metcalfe, 1835; Lord Auckland, 1836; Earl (Marquis) of Ellenborough, 1842; Sir H. Gough, 1843; Sir F. Currie (Lord Dalhousie), 1847; Lord Canning, 1856; Lord Elgin, 1862; Sir J. Lawrence, 1863.

THE FARM.

THE marvellous sale of bullocks at Sir Anthony de Rothschild's, coupled with the fact that there has scarcely ever been a Smithfield Club Show with so many good beasts above 5,0l. value, has made the army in the crack London butchers' shops this Christmas considerably beyond the average. The great market was also quite a quality one, and the 1,000 Scotch beasts (many of them first or second crosses with the shorthorn) were soon bought up, and at a rather good clean flesh—no small consideration when fat is only bringing 3½d. per lb.

In Scotland it has not been a very remarkable show year for cattle, but more for Clydesdale. Mr. Wm. Dunlop, indeed, and therefore did not exhibit his polls, at Kelso; and, with the exception of Rex Mauk and Quintessence, there was very special among the blacks. The sale of the Breadalbane West Highland cattle was the great feature of the Scottish year, and it will long be looked on such as the best lot of cattle ever sold in one lot. Mr. Cruickshank's is the most wonderful of the two, and a proof of what keen ducal rivalry will do for a fine show.

The shorthorn trade has been dull and heavy throughout the year, and the Christmas Fat Show has not been one of any special interpretation. The averages are low as compared with other seasons and the 'Champion' Ambassador, bred by Mr. Torr, of Lancashire trade (which includes First Fruits, 160gs.) has been pretty fair, and France has done a terrible year for cattle. Mr. Torr, of Mottram, Cheshire, has been the principal Australian buyer; but Mr. Chormside has done a little, and it is said that Mr. Cruickshank is to go. The Irish are improving its stock so much as quite to astonish the English drovers. Ireland has been no circuit there of late years; and the Duke of Devonshire has just sent over 100 to Lismore. Mr. Cruickshank, Mr. Wetherall's Old Cossey to that quarter. The largest sale was Mr. Shepherd's, at Lismore, in which 100 Shorthorns, 100 Irish, and were all sold in one day, by Mr. Strafford, in whose ears the hammer rang 'Fine, Fine, Fine.' Mr. Shepherd's sale have rounded rather strange. The highest average was at Lady Egust's sale, when 13 made 50l. 5s. each, and the lowest was at Lord Ducie's, at Barbraham sales, of which the joint average was 35l. 7s. 2d. 10l. 15s. Mr. Auldjo was fourth with 47l. 5s. 6d., and Mr. Albert Mr. Wetherall and Mr. Strafford have just divided the four highest honours. Mr. Wetherall's 13 averaged 41l. 19 average 41l. 19s. 6d. Noakes had an average of 43l. 2s. 2d. for 43, and Mr. R. Wilson of 43l. 5s. 6d. The Chairman Lord Chancellor (400 gs.), Lady Tigot's Prince Victor (230 gs.), and Lord Ducie's Duke (210 gs.) were the top prices for aged and yearling bulls and bull-calves; and the highest average was made by Mr. Strafford's sale, Lady Tigot's Rosedale (which has since, we are told, slipped her calf), and Lady Tigot's Rosedale (which has since, we are told, slipped her calf), and females. Mr. Bates made a spirited purchase at Babraham of twin heifer calves, which were by Mr. Bates's Duke of Oxford. In has been a remarkably weak year for young show bulls, and among the heifers the Duke of Devonshire's Lady Fragrant, Mr. Wetherall's the bulls. Her sensitive, Rosedale and Flower Girl, were more distinguished for symmetrical development for their age than for any surpassing excellence; and Mr. Strafford's Rosedale and Mr. Southwicke looked quite so blooming this year as she did at Battersea. Duke of Athol's Rosebud, Lord Ducie's Duchess, and Lord Berwick's piece we have at Kelso; and if they are not previously sold Mr. Douglas had the Duke of Athol's Rosebud, Lord Ducie's Duchess, and Princess of Attleborne at Newcastle.

The Mentmore Shorthorns at Hereford sale of the year, when 50 cows and heifers, in calf or with calves at their feet, averaged 23l. 10s. The Duke of Devonshire's Lismore sale, of which we have spoken, for which Mr. Colosmon, of Woburn Park, gave £44 4s.) realised and one previous sale, Mr. Shepherd's, Mr. Auldjo's, Mr. Albert's, has passed from the Lady meadow to the Whitfield herd Mr. Torr's, and Mr. Wetherall's Old Cossey to that quarter. Mr. Thomas has gone to Mr. Appesley's, and Mr. Dockham's factory to Mr. Bates's. Mr. Wetherall has sold his Duchess heifer in Baysham Court—three of them from Old Cadzile, Ruby, and Delight of Lismore—to Mr. Bates. Mr. Bates has also sold a bull-calf, unnoticed at Hereford, to Mr. Proteot, of Abbey Dore Court, Mr. Bates's first-prize Worcester heifer will be in no Mr. Bates's first-prize Worcester heifer will be in no Yubicle list; Mr. Bates's Duke of Oxford (1852) at Kelso; Mr. Bates's (1902) at Mr. Baldwin's, of Loddington, and Ada's heifer-calf at Mr. Capper's, of Neithrop, Banbury. Agnes, and Ada are all sisters, from the celebrated silver cow of the same name. Mr. Bates's eleven-year-old bull Carlisle (923) has failed in his feet at last, and goes to the Smithfield Club Show-yard, to be sold under the hammer, when the first prize is "the bull, cow, and offspring class at Tredegar, last month, and Mr. Bates's Carlisle, at Kelso, Mr. Bates's Duke of Carlisle, and second at Worcester and first at Cirencester, is also doomed.

The sale of Devons has been pretty good during the past year, although the Devon cattle are not in the fashion, and have not the most spirited customers. To compensate for this there has been an increase of attention to them, and a full sale of them every ten thousand." Mr. James Davy has sold the bull-calf from Tempress (the gold medal cow at Battersea) to the Rev. A. C. Thynne, of Kilkhampton, Cornwall. Mr. Davy has also sold to his Duke of Pitton, bull-calf from Princess 2nd, to Captain Hall, of Bradpenthy, and Mr. Davy has also sold to his Duke of Pitton, bull-calf Philip Hales. The female Devons were superior to the males at the Royal this year, and Mr. Davy has sold a number to the new owner of the judges to be the queen of the yard. The distance and the delays by rail are a great bar to the Devon trade, and will be so for a very full next July, but the breeders are determined to make a brave show when the society pitches its camp in their own country, in 1865.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of George Hobson, Esq., of Westbourne-road, was proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, on the 15th ult., bequeath the bulk of his property, with the exception of an annuity of £100, to be held in trust for his widow during her life, to his brother, Mr. Thomas Hobson's interest and share in the business and firm of Messrs. Reid and Co., brewers—in the event of his brother's decease, intestate.

The will of William Gardner, Esq., of Sussex-gardens, Hyde Park, was proved on the 15th ult., by his brother, Mr. John Henry Gardner, Esq., the sole executor, to whom he has intrusted the whole of his property under a settlement, dated the 29th ult., and leaving to the (testator's) niece a life interest in the sum of £60,000.

The will of Mr. Joseph Bell, late of Ivy, late in the Hon. East India Company's Madras Civil Service, who died at his residence, Hyde Park-street, on the 27th ult., was proved in the Prerogative Court under £70,000 personalty; the executors and trustees being G. D. Carr, Esq., of Chesterfield-street, Mayfair, Major Bell, of Bengal Artillery, and Mr. Bell, H. Russell, of St. John's College, Cambridge; to each of whom a legacy of £200 is bequeathed. The testator has left the residue of his property to be held in the families of his children, Mrs. Russell, Mrs. Carr, and Major Bell, the property of his eldest son. To his sons he leaves the residue of his estate, bequeathing to his daughters £10,000 each. Mrs. Bell, the testator's late daughter, Jane Eozonia, £16,000; together with certain contingent interests to his children; and an annuity of £250 to his sister, Louisa Bovell.

The ship Colsteraven (belonging to Messrs. Teighe and Smith, of London), Captain Knight, master, sailed from Plymouth on Monday for Melbourne, taking out 33 married couples, with 11 children and seven infants, two single men, and 11 single women. The Times says that the passage warrants "that in persons paid for by their friends in the colony, 30 married couples, 11 children, and 19 from Scotland have been shipped from Plymouth. Knight, the special agent for selecting persons in distressed circumstances, has been very careful in his selection. These cases have been assisted in their outfit, embarkation, and other expenses by the Lord Mayor of Dublin's Committee and the Victoria Emigrants' Assistance Society of London. The emigrants appeared to be of a very superior class, and have been highly approved of by the emigration officers. The Victoria Emigrants' Assistance Society have, as usual, provided on board the Colsteraven a library of about 300 volumes, of a useful and entertaining character, as well as copybooks and other works of elementary instruction. The passengers are in the charge of Dr. Wallis a surgeon appointed by the Board of Health, and the arrangements, as well as the accommodation, as will as the Government ships, are very complete to ensure the comfort and well-being of the passengers.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

IN the "railway clearance" on the east side of New Bridge-street, Blackfriars, the premises long known as the York Hotel are now in course of removal. Robert Mylne, the architect of Blackfriars Bridge, built this house for his own residence: on its southern face, in Little Bridge-street, is a medallion, with the initials "R. M." surmounted by his crest and the date MDCCLXX. The walls of the principal rooms bear several medallions of classic figures, which Mylne may have modelled in the professional manner. The street was mostly built in 1765, when the Fleet ditch was arched over. The choice of the design for Blackfriars Bridge led to a contest as to whether elliptical or semicircular arches were preferable: Mylne had advocated the former; Yeve, the semicircular; and Dr. Johnson, his friend, wrote three several letters in the Gentleman's Magazine in favour of the latter. Mylne's was the costly bridge about which this strong controversy was waged will have disappeared. Mylne, who attained the age of ninety-two years, is buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, of which he was for fifty years surveyor. He was the last appointed surveyor of the city of New River Company, in which he was succeeded by his son, William Mylne, who died in 1811. Mylne's friend, Hertz, a highly-cheerful years; on Christmas Day (Friday last). Mr. Mylne, also, a member the noble engineering family, Bridge, and superintended the covering of the Fleet ditch. He also built Adelphi Terrace, King-street, Mylne planned well his houses in Blackfriars, although many of them have been pulled down for insurance offices. In the house No. 6, opposite the York Hotel, lived Sir Richard Phillips, who was for a year Bridge-street, he published his Monthly Magazine. Here, as became a literary publisher, Sir Richard formed a collection of original portraits of living authors and artists, including Chaucer, Dryden, Locke, Prior, Pope, Addison, Steele, Swift, Akenside, and Richardson; Gray, Collins, Arkwright, Wolcot, and Lady Mary Wortley Montagu; besides, a curious picture of the Great Fire of London, and the drawing of old Temple Bar, engraved in Richardson's Correspondence: also a set of views of houses of eminent persons, by Sam. Ireland; and a host of minor curiosities. (We may here correct an error in page 376 of the column of 'Curious,' Insurance office at the corner of Ludgate-hill was the Albion, not the Rock, as stated there.

The Scotch pearl-fishery has lately been revived with great success by M. Morin, who has established a company for working since 1860. The Tay, the Leith, the Garry, and the Tummel are said to abound most in pearls, and in the last three months the Garry alone must have made as much as from £8 to £10 weekly. In 1862 the average price of a Scotch pearl was £3 10s., and in 1863 it was £4 10s. Many of the fisheries they have fetched from £5 to £20. One Scotch pearl has bought by the Empress Eugenie for 1,000 guineas; and M. Unger possesses a necklace of Scotch pearls which he values at £350.

Pantomimes, we suppose, have been played upon our stage 160 years, or since Weaver produced his "Tavern Bilkers." Downes, the Theatre Royal, Dublin, though it is commonly dated from Rich's "Harlequin Sorcerer," at Lincoln's-inn-fields (Nov. 1717). Dr. Doran, in his new book on the English Stage, dispatches the harlequinade with a few brief sentences and remarks. Still the same is accomplished something in this way. Tom Dibdin, in his "Memoirs," tells us that in the pantomime of "Harlequin Captain," "The Eight-mattled Racer," by which the proprietors cleared £10,000.

In the Gentleman's Magazine for the past month appears a very interesting letter from Thomas Selby, Esq., of Weetbourne-square, in support of the claim of the descendants of Sir William Selby, of Deane Selby, of Lightham Mote, indicates her to have been, in some sense, the revival of Lord Lyttelton's Act, as maintained by Major Luard, at the visit of the Archæological Institute to Hever in April last. The following facts, says Mr. Selby, on beyond dispute:—

"My great-great-grandfather (the daughter of Sir Henry Selby, Kt., second son of George, cousin of Sir William Selby, the husband of Elizabeth Boleyn) married Mary Boleyn, whose great-aunt Dorothy Selby discovered the meaning of the anonymous letter) to her children, Mary and Anne, communicated to her great-grandmother, the late Mrs. Selby, of the Mote, who died in 1845, at the age of ninety.

It had been objected by a Correspondent of the Gentleman's Magazine that the family papers had been lost or destroyed; but it is evident that the documents and papers of the Selbys were burnt with the family mansion at Deane Hall, Northamptonshire, in the reign of Charles the Second, and Roman Catholic branch of the Selby family may have known of the intended fire from informers and connivers of the Gunpowder Plot, and thus warned Sir William Selby for his safety; and that Sir William or his lady planned that the family papers should be burnt with the house. Mr. Thomas Selby had already stated that the papers were destroyed by the family and to the knowledge that they had been the means of averting an awful calamity from, so far as regarded the Protestant religion, himself, and his family. Sir William Selby's wealth and position may be inferred from his will and funeral certificates in the College of Arms. The Selbys were allied by blood and some intimacy between the families of Selby and Baron Montegle, to whom the Northamptonshire estates passed. Mr. Selby adds, further, that many coincidences, which he had never had ever been pointed out.—Francis Trenham was one of the executors to the will of Lord Treasurer Elizabeth, dowager Countess of Kent, Kt. May it not be inferred that the warning came through this channel?

Mistletoe has recently been introduced into West Cornwall from Devon and Somersetshire, by Mr. Rogers, of Penzance. Lingle's tenants of the inhabitants did not know the nature or modern use of mistletoe. Some farmers contracted with the gardener to put into their orchards; berries were a sort of white currant; and as much as sixpence was demanded for a small bunch.

The very valuable collection of oak furniture, porcelain, and pictures—the property of Mr. Alderman Goodrick, of Studley, in Warwickshire—has just been dispersed by auction, and realised upwards of £7,000. The ornamental china was a set of three superb old Sèvres vases, of the finest Louis Seize period (royal); the principal vase having a medallion centre, exquisitely painted in cupids: the other two vases, with panels of flowers, realised 100 guineas—112l., high; and each of the two end vases 14in. high, painted with medallion centres, the subjects the centre. In the library room was a noble oak sideboard, magnificently carved in masks, shields, and other devices, with the arms of Goodrick and Ingilby, and large lions, fruit, and cows; also a pair of side tables, supported by satyrs, sarcophagus shape, and the finest specimen of the kind in Sèvres; and previously been sold for £145,000 to Mr. Walker, of Birmingham.

The ancient parish church of St. Peter and St. John, Wakefield, and St. Thomas, in Southwark, for parochial, but not ecclesiastical, purposes, has been destroyed by fire. It was the first extension of railways in the district, no less than 200 houses have been pulled down, and only 50 houses left standing in St. Thomas's. The almost entire ruins of the parish church, and the demolition of the Thomas's Hospital, having rendered the parish church almost useless, it will be taken down to the ground. The fire in the Governors' Room, so far advanced to the Orator's cap, long and loud were the Cantabrian plaudits: in the hall, at the dais table, he was radiant and joyous; and when he gave the toast, "Floreat alternum Carthusiana domus," the fine old apartment rang to the roof with the enthusiasm of the guests at the tables and the visitors in the galleries. Everywhere he was recognised as the genius loci; and Charterhouse may well be proud of having nourished so sound a writer of pure idiomatic English and sterling humour as the author of the Makepeace Thackeray.

In wit a man, simplicity a child.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

Archdeacon Pakenham was a very popular preacher, and was very zealous in the discharge of his duties, and made friends of all with whom he came in contact. He was a liberal benefactor to the poor, and an extremely generous host. He took great interest in the restoration of the Cathedral of St. Patrick, several of the windows of which were the gift of Archdeacon Pakenham. He married Miss Louisa Gunnese, Esq., will now completely carry out. The Dean married, Jan. 1st, 1824, Miss Louisa Gunnese, second daughter of the late Rev. WILLIAM FELIX HILEY, ESQ.

This excellent and much-esteemed gentleman died a short time since at his seat, Forest Hill, near Wallingford, Berks. His decease, occurring so soon after that of his lamented wife, will be a severe loss to the poor and to the cause of religion in the neighbourhood of his neighbourhood, to whom at all times, but especially during the indisposition of his wife, he was a most liberal benefactor. CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SIBERIA.—Your order for free copies of the book containing "I. R. of Bridport," now in course of publication, has been duly noted in the list of subscribers, and will be duly forwarded to the publisher. Many thanks for your kind suggestion, which is excellent.

MARCUS.—Is shade of a polgrave's nose in your problem?

G. W. B.—Has the solver for playing 1st move in "Chess Puzzles."

J. P. M.—Your solution of No. 1 is correct, but your remarks there are not fair to such a problem as that, which is not intended for beginners.

LUCIAN.—Anything but "original, to appear. Its correctness is distinctly in a collection of 100 problems, which we have received about fifteen years ago.

ALPHA.—The first Chess Player known in the Bible. There is usually good play going on there every evening.

J. C. M.—The game of chess requires for its playing nine of the strongest players at the Chess Club from which he is excluded.

HOLLY-TREE.—Your problem is good, but the strictures of mocking to the fourth, and to the sixth, you are not correct. Thanks for your kind remarks.

R. and F.—The rule now adopted is the one you mention in that found in the Laws of Chess, which is, that the player who has the move has the option of his King or Queen Castle, whether he touch any piece or not. The more propriety speaking, you say King on the side whereon he lies out of the Rook, unless, before touching the Rook, he announces his intention to Castle on the Queen's side.

A NEW RECORD OF OLD GAMES.

We promised long, in compliance with the currently-expressed request of several correspondents, to publish a record of the games the Rose played in the match during the last twenty-five or thirty years. From the favourable reception this promise has met there is every reason to believe that our readers will find it to give a great amount of information and interest to chess matters. To the main body of them, indeed, these games will be matters of curiosity, since they are to be accompanied only by the moves, with of a critical and explanatory nature, they will present an aspect of novelty even to the few to whom they are not new. We begin with the first game played in the series, games contested by Mr. Cochrane and Mr. Staunton shortly after the former had left London in 1841.

THE DECOMPOSITION OF CARBONIC ACID GAS by the leaves of plants is the subject of a paper which has been recently laid before the Academy of Science at Paris. Numerous experiments have proved that plants put under a bell-glass filled with carbonic acid gas cause the disappearance of a portion of carbonic acid, giving cause to the disengagement of oxygen. This fact, which has been observed by many, have various causes. The first is endosmose, being the normal colour of the larger plant, and, as M. Cloez asserts, the decomposition commences with the disappearance of carbonic acid. Certain experiments in opposition to the opinion of MM. Saussure and Corneuvinder, that contrary to the action of the rays of the blue, yellow, and green, the red rays are principally decomposed gases, still retain it partially, and that it is by virtue of this part alone that they exercise their action. M. Cloez has found that the decomposition of carbonic acid by plants is of two kinds which lead M. Cloez to affirm that leaves decompose carbonic acid under the influence of all the rays of light, no matter which they contain, and that the yellow and red parts do not give rise to this decomposition.

THE ROMAN BRITISH VILLA AT ANCO, found in excavations in the department of the Gers, together with remains of door and other animals, were recently presented to the Academy of Inscriptions by M. Lacaussade, in the name of MM. Filhol and Garrigou. It is the first time that monuments of the age of stone have been found in the department of the south of France. The owner of these weapons, perhaps contemporaries of the builders of the lake habitations of Switzerland, and of the dolmens and caverns in which so many have been cast amongst them, since nearly all the weapons are made of a hard calcareous stone, and not of polished flint.

HABITS OF SPIDERS.—It is the opinion of some naturalists that spiders are deaf, and that their movements, by a combination of causes, are lions formed of the viscid fluid secreted by appropriate organs situated in the latter end of the body, and which, issuing from the spinnerets, is drawn out in the extents on the anatomy of spiders, has induced Mr. Blackwall, the able author of "Researches in Zoology," and of Great Britain and Ireland," before the Linnean Society, to discuss the reasons for his maintaining an opposite opinion. He admits the influence of the atmosphere in producing certain of the movements of the active spiders, but considers that a considerable quantity of the thread is immediately become concrete on exposure to the air, and that the whole is formed of a viscid fluid, which is drawn out and produced by certain muscular action, combining extreme tenacity with great flexibility, and quite irrespective of the atmosphere. Mr. Blackwall has observed that the young spiders, which only are endowed in a straight line of many feet in length, through a resisting medium liable to partial fluctuations from the slightest impulses, he has proved to be in the highest degree improbable, and directly at variance with the results of an extensive series of experiments instituted expressly for the purpose. He says that spiders placed on wooden or metallic rods set upright in glass vessels of water, and which, consequently, could not be affected in either of the ways enumerated by the opponents of his views, in vain attempt to effect an escape from them in a still more decided manner than those placed on the plain. Gossamer spiders, which are frequently perished in, proving quite unavailing when they are placed under a glass shade in a warm apartment, where the air was still and free from currents. However, when these insulated be exposed to a current of air, either naturally or artificially produced, they immediately, by the action of the wind upon the web, cast and result from the spinners a little of their viscid secretion, which, being carried out in a long line, is more or less entirely connected with some object or vicinity, and adorns them the means of regaining their liberty. The line is then drawn out by the wind, and the spider, letting go its hold, is carried off by it, and, in consequence from the spinners, it be subjected to the action of a lateral or opposite current, the spider becomes drawn in the same manner by the new thread as by the former one. The manner in which the line of spiders are drawn out from the spinners by the action of the wind is easily explainable, as the viscid matter is emitted from the spinners of the spiders are brought into contact, and viscid matter is emitted from the spinners is drawn out separated by a lateral current, which extends the matter into filaments concerning the papilla; on these filaments the current impinges, drawing them out in the direction of its own course, and the body is carried, and on the extremities of the spinners being again brought together the filaments become united into one thread.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL commenced his course on Electricity (adapted to an educated juvenile audience) on Saturday last, Dec. 26, his subject being "Electricity in Motion." He explained minutely the principles of electricity being abundantly illustrated by experiments. After a few introductory remarks on the importance and universality of the subject of investigation, and on some of natural phenomena, such as rain, snow, thunder, and lightning, Professor Tyndall proceeded to explain the different methods of developing electricity by friction, in the cases of dry glass rubbed by dry silk (with analogous cases of dry wax and dry sealing-wax), of a body in contact with one rubbed by undecidedly matter. The electrical machine and being attracted by electrified bodies, and repelled by bodies charged with the same kind of electricity; but these latter bodies were shown to be incorrect, inasmuch as when the rubber was charged with electricity of the wax and sealing-wax, the glass was found to be of the glass or the electricity obtained from glass by friction with silk is now termed positive, and that obtained from wax by friction with fur is termed by the name negative. The Professor demonstrated the fundamental law of electric action, that bodies charged with opposite electricities attract each other, while bodies charged with opposite electricities attract each other—Professor Tyndall illustrated this law by numerous experiments, and also by showing that bodies charged with the same electricities repel each other, the same thing existing the other. When charged electricities without at the by friction, the Professor showed that a body in contact with a body electricity of the rubber it is always the opposite to that of the rubber. It was shown that the metals are conductors and consequently cannot permit electricity to pass freely through them, and that others, termed insulators, permit its passage with difficulty. Professor Tyndall's explanation of induction was then explained as being exceedingly useful in comprehending many phenomena—Professor Tyndall's explanations were illustrated by means of two very invisible fluids, each of which is self-repulsive, the two fluids being supposed to exist in the same space, combined. The Professor then described the method of electrifying by friction contacts in the forcible separation of the two fluids, and the consequent repulsion of each fluid by each other over the body. The electrical glass is robbed with silk the positive fluid is supposed to cover the glass like a film, and the negative fluid is held by fastened to the glass by the attraction of the positive fluid. The positive fluid repels the positive and attracts the negative fluid, and the fluid repels the negative and attracts the positive fluid. The result is that the fluid adhere is attracted or repelled with the fluid, and hence arises the attraction and repulsion of electrified bodies.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL'S second lecture "On Electricity," delivered on Saturday last, was chiefly devoted to explanations and illustrations of the phenomena of induction. The theory of electric fluids supposes that the negative fluid is attracted by the positive fluid, and repelled by its own particles. The Professor demonstrated that when one electrified body was brought near an insulated one, but not into contact with it, the electricity of the former body repelled the unlike electricity of the latter, and attracted its own electricity to the nearest part of the latter. This forcible separation of the two fluids is termed "induction." Professor Tyndall illustrated this phenomenon by means of a pith ball coated with tinfoil, the side of the ball next the glass was found to be electrified with negative fluid, while the positive being repelled to the other side, the more proximity of the negative fluid to the glass rendered the attraction of the glass for the negative electricity. The repelled electricity was free; but the attracted electricity was held by the attraction of the glass. A pith ball was held in the hand, and a body just to the glass was found to be electrified by induction for a moment by a conductor with the earth, the free electricity escaping to the earth, but the attracted electricity remaining. Professor Tyndall then showed that a body positive will become free and the induced body remain electrified. The Professor then explained the theory of the electrical machine, and constructed a very cheap and efficient one—i.e. a small circular sheet of zinc, with a stick of sealing-wax for a handle, and a piece of flannel. Another piece of zinc, with an insulating handle, was placed on the sealing-wax, and the flannel was then rubbed briskly on the sealing-wax, and in a few more moves, the zinc was charged with positive electricity. The lecture concluded with an explanation of electric condensation, and the construction of the Leyden jar.

A letter from Naples of the 14th ult. says:—"Vesuvius has become covered with snow, and now presents the appearance of a sugar-loaf. It is a vast cone, quite white from the summit to the base. We have also a veil so cold that it nips the face, and any one might fancy himself at the foot of Mount Ida, in the midst of the snows of the Alps."

UNCONSCIOUS CONSTITUTIONALISM.

AT a time when Europe has been asked to reconsider the Treaty of Vienna it is not without interest to observe to what extent the programme there laid down has been actually carried out. The political principles and objects which it was then sought to establish were anything but friendly to the rights of peoples; and, indeed, those rights, as represented even by England, were but feebly insinuated. The influence of Russia was so great that, practically, her ideas of government were pressed upon Europe. Nevertheless, in the half century which has since elapsed, the silent working of Constitutionalism has exploded Russian influence and Russian ideas of government, which have been replaced either by Representative Government or by Governments which only mimic the forms, perhaps, but which still are obliged to borrow and adopt their system of publicity and popular control. This is proved by the fact that there is scarcely a country in Europe which does not now make public its financial arrangements. They may not be very accurate, and may, perhaps, be what we call a little cooked: but, on the whole, most of the peoples of Europe know, in round numbers, the expenditure of their Sovereigns.

The veil is therefore lifted from the mysteries even of despotic Governments, and Emperors and Sultans render themselves more or less amenable to public opinion, at least in the important matter of finance. The progress of society, science, and industry, of improvements and requirements, has rendered civil as well as military government far more expensive than it used to be; so much so, that the wants of Continental Sovereigns everywhere exceeded their revenues. The consequence has been the necessity for loans, causing a dependence on that public support which is involved in public credit. It is the necessity of satisfying the exigencies of public credit that has forced such Governments as those, of all others, of Russia and Turkey to make public their expenditure and the estimate of their revenue. This is gentle and gradual revolution effected by the growing influence of the powerful middle classes. It is clear that, looking to the great change which we have attempted to show has taken place in the financial departments of all Governments, the wealthy middle classes abroad have gradually augmented their influence in an immense degree. It would be an exaggeration to say that the middle classes of the Continent had, through their financial influence, attained more than their due and natural importance; but it is not too much to say that the great mass of the people perhaps never made their ideas and their wishes more fully felt by their Governments than they do at the present moment.

The cases of Russia and Turkey, to which we have already alluded, are certainly striking instances of the fact. But it seems to us that the case of France is, if possible, stronger still. It must be remembered that Imperialism in France, as it was founded by the present Monarch of that country, was the purest of despotisms. Gradually, however, and, as we believe, owing to the natural leanings or the tendencies of the Emperor's mind, unconsciously acquired during his residence in England, the seeds of Constitutionalism have found their way into the uncongenial soil of despotism. At this moment there is something like a crop rising from those seeds. Never, perhaps, was the influence of the middle class in France more strongly felt in the highest places than it now is. The polypus feelers of trade and commerce have spread themselves far and wide through nearly every class of society in France. It is felt now that the question of peace or war does not wholly depend on the Jove-like nod of a great individual. We will venture to say that it is only the French army that is ready for war. It appears to us that the astute and experienced statesmen who now lead the Opposition in the Legislative Body of France, being quite conscious of the real state of things, are taking advantage of it with singular adroitness. It would seem that they think that opinion well stated and held before the public is a more powerful instrument of gaining the ends they have in view than popular revolution. They leave all to the workings of opinion, and do not even take so much action as is implied in the eager pressure of a vote in the Chambers. The result is that despotism, pure or diluted, is left in a dilemma from which it is very difficult to escape.

If our object, which has been to show the gradual progress of popular influence in the most striking form in which that process has been at all attained, the obvious result is that the great truth suggested by the events of the time is that representative assemblies and constitutions, honestly worked, would prove as useful to Sovereigns in political as in financial exigencies. We hope that the period is approaching when the belief that popular representation was only a stumbling-block in the way of Government will be regarded, like the example of the Emperor of the French he specially noted, wise, setting out on a great experiment of reigning as an Autocrat, has, in less than a decade, found out all its difficulties, and has tacitly acknowledged his mistake. He has had the good sense to admit this, at least with regard to the management of his finances. In money matters he grants that Parliamentary participation may have the effect of preventing the whole burden of financial responsibility falling upon the Emperor, spreading it over the broad shoulders of the whole community. He has not, perhaps, admitted the same great truth in other matters; but there are signs that his faith even in a monopoly of political power is shaken. It will be no matter of great surprise if, ere long, he should practically cede the principle that, in matters of domestic and of foreign policy, publicity and Parliamentary freedom were the best safeguards to Government and the best support to a Throne.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The official reception on the occasion of the new year took place yesterday week, at the Tuileries, with the usual ceremonials.

At half-past eleven the Emperor and Empress received the high officers of the Army, the Commander-in-Chief of the Imperial Guard, the Grand Mistress of her Majesty's Household, the ladies of honour to the Empress, the officers and ladies of the household of their Majesties and of the Princes and Princesses of the Imperial family; then the Senators, and Ministers, and Legislators, the Privy Council, Marshals of France, Admirals, the Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honour, and the Governor of the Invalides.

At twelve their Majesties, accompanied by the whole Court, attended Divine service in the chapel of the palace, afterwards retiring to their apartments.

At one o'clock the Emperor received in the Throne-room the Diplomatic Body in deputation of the Grand Master of the Order of Honour, the Senate, the Legislative Body, the Council of State, a deputation of the Grand Officers of the Order of Honour, the Council of the Order, and the civil and military authorities usually received at this new year. His Majesty was then joined by Prince Napoleon, Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte, and the Princess Letizia and Princess Mathilde, the Ministers, and the Marshals of the palaces. The senators, members of the Council of State, deputies, Legislative, civil functionaries were all in official costume, and the naval and military officers in full-dress uniform. The Diplomatic Body, as the usual, offered their congratulations to the Emperor on the occasion of the new year, the Papal Nuncio acting as spokesman in the following language :—

Sire,—The members of the Diplomatic Body assembled round your Majesty are anxious to express, on the occasion of the New Year, the wishes which they form for the prosperity of your Majesty and your august family, and for the prosperity of France. As the interpreter of the sentiments of the Diplomatic Body on this solemn occasion, I am happy, Sire, to present to you its most respectful homage.

The Emperor replied in these words :—

I thank you for the wishes you express to me in the name of the Diplomatic Body. They are in accordance with those which I myself entertain for preserving the messings earned by questions in suspense, I feel confident that the spirit of conciliation which animates the Sovereigns will remove difficulties and maintain peace.

His Majesty also spoke separately in kindly terms to the various heads of legation; and, addressing the English Ambassador, the Prime Minister of the United States, expressed the hope that 1864 would be for America a year of reconciliation and peace.

The bands and drums of the different regiments of the garrison of Paris assembled, early in the morning on the Carrousel, and then proceeded to the courtyard of the Tuileries, where the usual salutes on the occasion of the New Year's Day were performed under the Imperial windows. The bands and drums of the National Guard and of the Imperial Guard were at the same time to pay a similar compliment. When the music had ceased, a window in the pavilion de l'Horloge opened, and the Emperor, the Empress, and the Prince Imperial came out on the balcony, and were received with loud cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" "Vive l'Impératrice!" "Vive le Prince Impérial!"

A dinner was given at the Tuileries on the same day to which the Imperial family, the Ministers, Marshals, and high dignitaries of the Court were invited. Covers were laid for 140.

The Emperor and Empress were present at the Théâtre Français on New-Year's Eve to witness the representation of "Les Fourberies de Scapin."

The report of the committee upon the supplementary credits requested by the Government last session, which we conclude as follows :—"Our mission is to warn the executive power with all fidelity, respect, and zeal, to hold it back on the brink of dangerous entanglements. The best devotion is that which knows how to foresee salutary truths in time of need. We are unanimous in advising that an end should be put to the Mexican expedition, and that it be given up by any price, but as promptly as the interest and honour of France will permit. The expenses of this expedition are a burden on the general sentiment of the country, and we think the Government of the Emperor will receive it with favour." The Government immediately propose the adoption of the bill.

The Correspondance Havas says that "warnings" within less than two years, has been suspended for two months, for an article by M. Prévost-Paradol. The writer is accused of exciting hatred, contempt, and consequences of the loan voted by the Corps Législatif, and of inciting to the hatred and contempt of the Government by his injuriously ironical appreciations of its policy."

The Ministerial Constitutionnel announces to the Mayors of communes throughout France instructing them that, in case of any sudden mourning marriage, they are to ascertain, by inquiry of the couple about to be married, whether they are aware that the Civil Code does not permit the celebration of the issue of a cousin-german. Should the answer be in the affirmative, the Mayor is to make a formal note of the information supplied, and to mention it on the margin of the marriage certificate. This measure is adopted with a view to give information to the scientific men who are inquiring into the result of consanguineous marriages as to their issue.

The period of the carnival being unusually short this year, only three grand balls will be given at the Tuileries during that season. The first took place on the 6th inst., the second will take place on the 20th, and the third on the 3rd of February. There will be a reception every Monday in the private apartments of the Empress.

Mgr. de Bonnechose, Archbishop of Rouen, has been consecrated for the loss of the French Primacy, destined to him by the Emperor, but obstinately refused to him by the Minister of Public Worship, M. Rouland, and the entire clergy, by its elevation to the dignity of Cardinal.

The Pastor Frederic Monod, the well-known leader of the religious party which seceded from the National Reformed Church of France on account of its connection with the State, has just died in Paris.

A serious accident occurs with the State, has just died in Paris. the Northern Railway (Paris to the Channel coast) by the collision of two trains. Five carriages were broken, and the engineers thereof were killed on the spot. There were about twenty persons more or less severely injured.

A communication from Avignon states that repeated shocks of earthquake have been felt in the commune of Lagnes, in the village of Lagnes, near the fountain of Vaucluse. Several houses were so much shaken that the inhabitants abandoned them.

The treaty signed by the French Government and the Federal Council of Switzerland for the demolition of the fortifications of the harbour of Duppes, which has caused so much difficulty, has been ratified by both parties, and the ratifications exchanged.

The Corps Législatif held a private sitting on Monday afternoon for the purpose of hearing M. de Morny, the President, read the draught of his address in reply to the Emperor's Speech from the Throne. The document, we are assured, "was very favourably received" by the members present. The address, it is said, "congratulates the Government, particularly attached to Imperial institutions, and applauds the resolution of the Emperor to persevere in the development of the path of industrial and commercial liberty. It expresses a wish that the public work should not be diminished, and that interior reforms should be developed. The address then says :—

The Corps Législatif sympathises with the Emperor that the most wisely-governed nations cannot always escape foreign complications, and that even the most pacific Sovereigns are sometimes obliged to have recourse to arms. It will not express opinions to China, Cochin-China, and Mexico have greatly diverted the attention of Europe on account of the changes and sacrifices they impose. We acknowledge that these expeditions must inspire respect for our countrymen; but we desire that they may be terminated, and that peace may be restored to the world. You should be happy to see realised shortly the good results for which your Majesty has undertaken them.

On the Polish question the address says :—

The revolutionary movement is a deplorable scourge of humanity which anxiety to excite the most earnest sympathies for Poland, as if we have seen with grief the failure of the efforts of that unfortunate nation. We have, however, not forgotten that the sincere and cordial support of Russia has been of great value to France.

We should not have any collision in our friendly relations with that Power, and have therefore seen with pain the irritation manifested in the Russian Empire against France. We have not ceased to be true friends. France, on whom it has bestowed splendour and glory in the past, is ready to renew with it the cordial relations which unite the children in cause in which her honour and her interests are not at stake.

Leave without regret, Sire, the path of revolutionary agitation to your loyal and pacific populations. Noble and sound ideas make way in the world, and take root in the future. Your Majesty may rely on the support of your generous words.

The Chamber, numerous, compact, strong, and confident in you, fears no aggression, because it has no other ambition than to assure her repose and develop her material wealth, and because it knows that your glory and that of France are based on the practice of civil and political liberties.

On the following day the Emperor received in private audience and amicably discussed with the address, expressing greater sympathy with Poland, and in opinion that it is expedient to recognise the Poles as belligerents.

PORTUGAL

The King opened the Cortes on Saturday. His Majesty announced that his Spouse had given birth to a daughter, who died in April.

Tobacco may henceforth be cultivated in Madeira and the Azores. The Budget for a sufficient amount of revenue is no deficit.

Senhor T. Horta, formerly Minister of Public Works, is dead.

Famine prevails in the Algarves, in consequence of the total absence of rain for the last fifteen months.

HOLLAND.

A ministerial change at the Hague has been caused by the want of accord between M. Van der Maesenle Sooutrop, Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the Chamber. On December, which has rejected his Budget. After differing in reference to this Budget—viz., a vote of the 28th of April on the Polish question—the Chamber has declared itself opposed to taking what practical interest Holland could have in that question; the Minister, M. Van der Maesenle Sooutrop, has declared that and the German question in connection with the position of Holland as a Power of the first rank. Consequently, the Chamber has refused to the Dutch contingent called out in the Schleswig-Holstein affair.

The King has accepted the resignation of Jonkheer P. van der Maesenle Sooutrop, and appointed Jonkheer Rochussen, late Governor-General of the Indies, Minister of the Interior, ad interim Minister for Foreign Affairs.

SWEDEN.

The King, in his reply to the address recently sent to him by the Chamber of Deputies, protesting against the policy of the Prussian Ministry in the Schleswig-Holstein question, declares that the Chamber, in effect, that they have nothing to do with foreign policy, which, by the Constitution, is the affair of the Crown alone. The reply, however, goes on to give some general notion of the attitude Prussia has determined to assume in the Schleswig-Holstein affair.

The Chamber of Deputies may feel assured that the course in foreign policy taken by my Government will be in accordance with the rights which it possesses weighed. I have adopted their resolutions while mindful of the interests of the country, and I have done so in the conviction that I am acting in accordance therein, but at the same time with the resolve to guard German rights in the Duchies, and to maintain the independence of Sweden and the free action of Scandinavia. My mind is bound to gain. The decision appertaining to me by the Constitution to make peace or war, and to conclude treaties, I shall not fail to exercise in accordance with the application can only be arrived at by myself.

I shall be guided therein by the circumstances which may present themselves, and by the wishes of the nation, and by the interest of Sweden and Germany, while at the same time preserving that independence of action which is necessary for the maintenance of the rights of the country. I can, therefore, only declare arbitrarily and without regard for the international relations of the country, that the question will be examined by the German Confederation with no co-operation. The Government will, however, not neglect to communicate to the Chamber of Deputies should be taken to furnish the means for the execution of measures determined upon, and in which they may believe it to be their duty to participate.

I should not be able to accept a proposition, which so vehemently urges me to a declaration of war, should refuse the means thereto at the moment and open the spot when such action appeared necessary.

The Government of the King requests the Chamber to go on with the consideration of the bill for the loan, which is of so much importance for the prosecution of the late address, not rejected.

The King's reply was considered by the Loan Committee, who deliberated upon the matter on Monday. During the sitting the Minister of War, M. Posse, declared that he could not support the policy of the Government. He "hoped that the House would rather grant the means required for the defence of the country, than obtain them by its own authority."

On Tuesday the Chamber voted the budget of the Minister of the Interior. The Commission proposed to strike out an item of 35,000 rix-dollars for the Budget.

It is said that on his way from London back to Berlin the Crown Prince had an audience of the Prince of Augustenburg, an old friend of his, who rode with him in the train from the Danish frontier to Kiel. The interview at the Royal Highness has been very active in the interest of the popular cause.

The Colonial at Berlin has just received a gift of a peculiar value on the occasion of the erection of a new medical altar, which the inhabitants presented in conjunction with the King. The gift alluded to is an embroidered altar-cloth, which was presented by the Queen, at whose desire all the Princesses of the Royal family took part in the manufacture of the offering, and each division bears the initials of the Princess by whose hand that particular portion was executed.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

On Wednesday week the Prince of Augustenburg travelled, by way of Hamburg, by steamer to Glückstadt, and there by special train to Kiel, where he arrived at three o'clock next morning. He entered the town in an open carriage, and was received with great enthusiasm. The Prince was proclaimed Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, and showed himself to the people. He has received congratulatory deputations from all parts of the country. The Prince, in reply to a leader of a grand torchlight procession, spoke of the necessity of union between the Government and its subjects, and expressed the confident hope that he would soon assume the government. Under the title of Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, the Prince has issued a proclamation to the people of the duchies (given in full as page 41), in which he declares that "the provisional executive, which has come to have any object." He is resolved that there is no longer any reason for the administration of the duchy by federal commissioners; but he hopes that the Diet will immediately hand over the federal administration.

The Danes have evacuated all the towns in Holstein and Lauenburg, but everything bebetokens that Denmark will resist any encroachments upon her territory. The Danish army has been largely added to the northern bank of the Eider (forming, with the canal of the same name which empties into the Baltic, a boundary line between Schleswig and Holstein), to dispute the passage of German troops.

The Federal army is being concentrated in the Danish army. He says :—"The new year finds you in arms for the defence of your fatherland, and you are therefore among you. I have entered Brod. Our cause is the honour of our country, and it shall be upheld with peace, or, if necessary, by the sword of arms. No life is too costly for the salvation of the fatherland. From the former struggle the army has received unfading laurels, and I am sure the young troops will now follow with enthusiasm. Courage, not numbers, above all determining success. Whatever in all cases lead to victory." And, concluded by saying he should soon gladly visit the different divisions of the army. He has received a large portion of the army on Sunday, and was to leave for Friedrichstadt on Monday.

About 11,000 men of the Federal troops have been called out by the Ministry of War. Large reinforcements are to be sent to Eckernförde and Rendsburg. In case of war, it is believed that flank attacks will be made from that position.

The Danes have destroyed very heavy requisitions upon the southeastern districts of Schleswig, and have demanded here four hundred three-horse carts, and another for 3,000,000 lb. of straw.

The Schleswig correspondent of the Times, writing on the 31st of December, describes the gradual occupation of Holstein by the Saxon and Hanoverian troops. He says :—"The movements of armies of the German troops will be bringing the southern bank of the Eider, and about the Danish northern frontier of Schleswig. The Danes are concentrating in heavy masses along their previously selected position on the Danish side of Rendsburg and Friedrichstadt. This line is of great strength; it extends along a chain of hills which are here studded with villages, and is situated by inundations. Should the commissioners of the confederation determine to march their troops into Schleswig, they are prepared to force this formidable position, where full 50,000 hayonets will engage to meet the attack."

Nothing of particular interest is reported respecting the doings of the federal troops in Holstein. It is, however, stated by the papers that they have superseded the authorities of Plon, who were too loyal, it is believed, to the Danish Government, appointed other officials in place. The commissioners have appointed to Frankfort for fresh instructions.

The German papers state that the Danes have fired on the town, to seven votes, a motion made by the Austrian representative to the effect that Prussia and Austria should occupy Schleswig should be immediately summoned to quit Holstein.

The Archbishop of Upsala has been engaged in the useful task of recalling to their senses those bellicose insane fanatics, the Danish "Scandinavians." The correspondence of Tuesday publishes an article from the Archbishop, in which the prelate of Upsala publishes an article regarding their power to undertake attacks upon the integrity and independence of other countries, and to the Confederation of Europe. "The mission of protecting the Confederation against any chances which might menace it belongs to the Confederation itself, and to the great German Powers, and the minor States are mistaken if they think to be able to protect their interests against Europe by their own little alies on their own risk."

The Aftonbladet, of Stockholm, which approved a few ago of the abstention of Sweden in the Dano-German conflict, now claims in which the warlike Scandinavian spirit of this moment. In giving an account of the meeting at Christiana, and of the addresses of the Swedish and Norwegian deputations, says that these demonstrations would become more lively still, and would attract the attention of Sweden," says the Aftonbladet, "which should be heard on the Eider, when the ships of the federal fleet shall appear before the first retreat."

The Continental papers are strongly speculating as to the attitude which England will maintain in the Danish question. The German papers take it for granted that the report says that the new Premier, Bishop Monrad, is believed to be still more opposed to further yielding on his predecessor.

WAR INTELLIGENCE.

We have news from New York to December 26. Everything was quiet to that date in the army of the Potomac. The troops were building down into comfortable winter quarters. Nothing of importance has been done in connection with the blockade of Charleston. A slight skirmish took place on the 20th ult. between a small body of Confederate cavalry and a cavalry force from Warsaw Gap. The Confederates retreated after a few shots were exchanged.

Rumours are current that a battle has been fought at Federals at Bear Station, and was reported to be contemplating fresh operations; but it was said that the railway communication with Richmond had been more or less obstructed by a successful "raid" made on the Virginia and Tennessee Railway by the Confederate cavalry. Gen. Sherman, the Federal commander, was moving to reinforce Hardee, and was, it was said, in the vicinity of the Southern army in Georgia.

The Federals are going into winter quarters at Chattanooga.

The Federal Commissioners were reported to be about to attack Little Rock, but they had sustained a repulse in an attempt on the outposts of Fort Gibson.

General Rosecrans is to supersede General Schofield in Missouri.

The bombardment of Charleston continued. It had been reported that several vessels attempting to run the blockade had become hopelessly entangled in the obstructions placed in Charleston Harbour, and were in a very dangerous position; but it had subsequently been declared that there was no foundation for the report.

There was a rumour at New Orleans that a mutiny had broken out among the coloured troops in Fort Jackson. The Federals had abandoned the Teche country.

There is no news of importance from Texas. Generals Banks and Kirby Smith were exchanging prisoners.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Federal Congress have voted 20,000,000 dollars for bounties and advances to volunteers, and have rejected a motion against exhausting the legality of the Conscription Act to the Supreme Court.

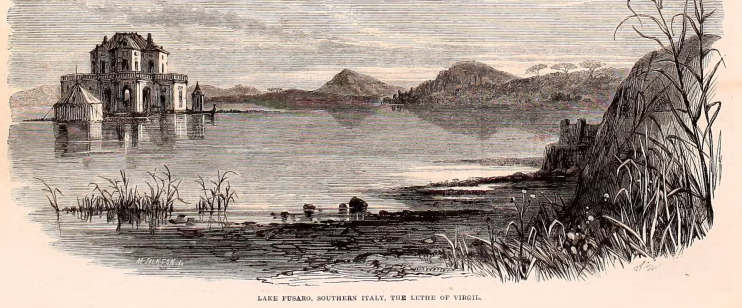
THE CHURCH OF ST. JUDE, GRAY'S-INN-ROAD.

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY, LEE, KENT.

ST. JUDE'S CHURCH, GRAY'S-INN-ROAD.

THIS church was erected to take the place of a temporary one of the same name at the back of the new building. It is situated in a district, having a population of 9000, assigned from the parish of St. Pancras by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with an endowment from them of £300 a year. The Rev. J. M. Andrews is the Incumbent. This is the first church which has received aid from the Bishop of London's fund. The inscription-stone was laid, on the 20th of November, 1862, by Lord Calthorpe, and the building was consecrated by the Bishop of London on the 28th of October last. It has a nave 85 ft. long, 34 ft. wide, and 56 ft. high; north and south aisles of the same length; a chancel 35 ft. long by 22 ft. wide, with two chancel aisles, over one of which is the tower. The clerestory has twelve windows on each side, grouped in pairs by the shafts of the roof trusses brought down and resting on bold corbels in the spandrils of the nave arches. Internally, the church is faced with white brick, relieved with red and black in bands and discharging arches. The nave columns are of red Mansfield stone, the arches and mouldings of Bath stone. In the chancel the columns are of marble. The pulpit is of stone, and also the prayer-desk and font, which latter was a gift to the church. The roof is of deal, stained. The church is fitted with open benches, and will seat nine hundred. All the windows in the chancel are of stained glass. The three lancet windows, the gift of a lady, represent the Birth, Crucifixion, and Resurrection of Our Lord. The large rose-window is a thank-offering of the congregation: in the centre circle is the Ascension; and in the tracery round the Annunciation are—Darkening in the Temple, the Baptism, the Agony, Bearing the Cross, the first Appearance to Mary, the Journey to Emmaus, and the Pentecost. The reredos is of Caen stone, and represents the Last Supper carved in relief, the wall on each side being richly covered with tiles in pattern. The organ, which is of original arrangement, is in the chancel aisle, under the tower, and is free and open to the choir. From the natural inclination of the site, a large room is formed under the chancel, which is entered on the level of the street at the east end. The chief entrance to the church is from the Gray's-inn-road by an open cloister. The tower is at the south-east angle, and is 100 ft. in height, terminating with an iron finial. Mr. Joseph Peacock was the architect, and the builders were Messrs. Carter. The cost of the church was £6000, and that of the site £2700.



HOLY TRINITY CHURCH, LEE, KENT.

THIS church was consecrated by the Bishop of London on the 19th of November last. The plan consists of nave, chancel, north and south transepts, vestry, and organ-chamber. The nave and chancel are 34 ft. wide, the total length of the church being 125 ft. The roof is of deal, stained; the principals are supported on semicircular laminated ribs 11 in. deep. The pulpit and font are of Caen stone, enriched with foliage and inlaid bands. Accommodation is provided for 600 adults in open stalls, on the ground floor, and 150 in the western gallery, which is approached by a semicircular staircase, terminated by an open-framed bell-turret, roofed with slate. Sculpture is introduced in the tympanum of the west doorway: the subject is the creation of the world, in six medallions arranged round a centre one, which contains a conventional figure of the Creator. The church and parsonage adjoining, together with the site, are the free gift of Lewis Glenton, Esq., of Blackheath, at a cost of nearly £16,000. The works have been carried out from the designs of Mr. Swinden Barber, of Buckingham-street, Adelphi.

THE LETHE OF VIRGIL.

On the borders of the delightful Gulf of Baiæ, within an hour and a half's ride from Naples, is the white little town of Puzzuoli, often resorted to by invalids for the sake of the sea air, particularly salubrious in this neighbourhood. Facing Puzzuoli, a long green promontory, terminated by a rocky pyramid called Cape Miseno, presents its refreshing aspect to the view; and far beyond arise the summits of the far-famed island of Ischia. On crossing the Gulf of Baiæ, from Puzzuoli to the opposite shore, the first object of attraction is the Lake Fusaro, or the Lethe of Virgil, which forms the subject of our Illustration (from a sketch by M. Mariani). The lake is at a short distance from the shore, and its waters do not communicate with the Gulf of Baiæ, but with the Mediterranean, on the other side of the promontory.

The country about this spot is renowned for the Falernian wine, sung by Horace; and the gulf itself, now so calm, offers a pleasing contrast to the remembrance of the orgies and crimes committed on its banks by the Roman Emperors, notably of the assassination of Agrippina by her son, Nero. But other ideas are awakened by a visit to the Lethe; and the Homeric traditions, adapted by Virgil with so much skill in his "Æneid" as to lead to a sort of belief in the actual identity of the sites so graphically described by the poet, are here recalled to the imagination, which reverts to the mythological period (represented by the proximity of the Styx, the Acheron, the Cocytus, the Elysian Fields—all mysteriously connected with the post-mortem punishments invented by the pagans) and to the mythical monsters. Instead of wandering spirits hovering about its banks, herds of wild boars frequent the woods that border the illustrious lake, and in its myriads of fishes oysters stand in the second commercial rank of their destiny. The Court of Victor Emmanuel indulges, in the vicinity, in the pleasure of the chase; and the Count de Cavour, on our Engraving serves as a place of rendezvous for the princely chasseurs, who refresh themselves with the game, and with the produce of both the exquisite oysters of the locality. The Lethe is said to occupy the site of an ancient lake of volcanic origin, as a confirmation of this supposition may be gathered from the fact that in 1838 an immense quantity of big oysters was destroyed by the cessation of deleterious gases. Around the lake are to be found the villas of the Princes of several Roman villas, ennobled by the classical recollections connected with the immortal names of Horace and Virgil.

PRESENTATION TO THE COUNTESS OF YARBOROUGH.

A GRATIFYING testimonial of public and private respect has recently been made to the Countess of Yarborough at Brocklesby Hall, Lincolnshire. Both the Earl and the Countess enjoy the confidence of the chase, and, it being their delight that others should participate in the amusement, the Brocklesby hunt is kept up in all the prestige which has always rendered it famous among the packs of England. As an acknowledgement of the liberality of the Earl and hospitality of the Countess, it was determined by the gentlemen who usually join the hunt to present her Ladyship with an equipage appropriate to herself, and Wednesday, the 23rd ult., was the day appointed for the ceremony. The portrait is of life size, the picture measuring 10 ft. by 6 ft. The Countess is represented in the centre of the group. Brilliant, with two favourite hounds, named Gambler and Charity, at its feet. It is a striking and picturesque likeness, and was executed by J. Grant, Esq., at a cost of five hundred guineas. Shortly after ten o'clock a large number of gentlemen assembled on the lawn, opposite a hunting costume, and, forming a procession, marched to the entrance of the hall, headed by Mr. Thomas Brooke, the bearer of the presentation committee. They were invited into the spacious drawing-room, at the end of which was the picture, covered with a crimson veil. Shortly afterwards the Earl and Countess, accompanied by several ladies and gentlemen, guests of his Lordship, entered the room. Mr. Joseph Kirkham, the secretary to the committee, who has been indefatigable in carrying out the presentation, read, on behalf of the subscribers, an address to her Ladyship. The address was then unveiled, and Mr. Brooke begged her Ladyship's acceptance of the gift. The Countess, in a few well-chosen sentences, gracefully expressed her gratitude. "I shall always value it," said her Ladyship, "as a work of art, but it is still dearer to me as a mark of the love and good-feeling existing between us." The noble Earl then invited all the subscribers present to partake of refreshments. After the rounds being in front of the hall, the Earl gave the signal for starting, and the whole cavalcade soon swept out of sight.

THE CONFEDERATES QUITTING BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS.

THE town of Brownsville lies on the Texan bank of the Rio Grande (or Rio Bravo) del Norte, about two miles from Matamoras, a town of some note in Mexico, on the south side of the river. Both towns are built almost entirely of wood, Brownsville has a neat and bright appearance. There was a considerable Confederate garrison at this place; but the inhabitants, having, on Monday, Nov. 2, 1863, received information of the arrival of a fleet of Federal steamers off the Rio Santiago, began immediately to evacuate the town; and for two days every means of transit across the river was in requisition, the excess with goods, furniture, cotton, and baggage; while upon both banks were piled in confused heaps the remainder of the goods, stores, vehicles, and merchandise of every description. About three o'clock p.m. on Saturday, the 3rd ult., the Confederate troops commenced burning the garrison buildings, the cotton, and all public stores they were unable to remove. On the 4th, Gen. Slaughter, late under-secretary of General Banks, took quiet possession of the place.

Our Engraving on the preceding page is from a photograph by Mr. A. G. Wedge, of Matamoras.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered an address to the members of the reading-room at Buckley, Flintshire, on Monday evening, for the purpose of opening the room. Sir Stephen Glynne, the father of Mr. Gladstone, after referring to the immediate object which had called them together, expressed his opinion of a workman's reading-room as being in itself a striking contrast between the rational habits of animals and man. It was natural for the animal to seek its food and then to lie down to sleep. Man, he thought, to be what he ought to be, must aspire to give a portion of his time to intellectual pursuits. What were the conditions which were necessary for the enjoyment of the quiet time of leisure? They were, first, a good and public-house, and though he would not speak in extreme language of those who, as he was informed, spent the greater part of their time in the public-house was not a desirable place for a labouring man to spend that portion of his time which was not devoted to work. He thought that schools and reading-rooms were greatly preferable. Having spoken further on the subject of education in the middle of the week, he had no intention to address the kind they were then inaugurating, to dwell upon the subject of education. He would, however, say a few words upon it. He considered that Englishmen were not by far so strictly as the inhabitants of Scotland and Wales; but he thought that the system of education, whether in Scotland, Wales, or England, was not the fault of the French labouring man, while the latter got 20 or 30 per cent less wages than the former. It had been for many years the practice of the Legislature of this country to do what they could to induce the labouring classes of this country to be thrifty and provident. For that purpose they had established the Post Office savings banks, so that nothing now was wanting but the disposition to be provident, and that disposition would in a great degree be supplied by an Act of Parliament, might be greatly encouraged by such institutions as that which they were then opening. The Legislature had established the principle of an independent free community like ours a greater blessing than that of the most liberal grant of money to the people. The right hon. gentleman referred at length to the virtue of thrift, recommending it for the reason that it confirmed the habits of the people, their obedience to law and institutions. He referred to the case of a poor day; and concluded by remarking on the utility of the Post Office savings banks. The right hon. gentleman sat down amid loud cheers.

This was the reason that the Grand Vizier, Aali Pasha, and Fuad Pasha, the latter—had been to a French theatre. The Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, who recently purchased an estate in Norfolk, has commenced the erection of a new mansion which it extends, with a view to its being distributed among the poor. The Maharajah is fond of field sports, and intends to keep a pack of fox-hounds, as well as an English country gentleman.

Mr. Thomas Brassey, writing in a letter to the Sussexan, mentions the increasing value of the Bexhill peat-deberies. He is in the habit of supplying largely the Brighton and Hastings markets, whereas last many valuable localities are as yet untouched, and that during last summer several cargoes were shipped to London.

Whittlebury Lodge, the seat of Lord Southampton, near Towcester, Northamptonshire, was destroyed by fire on Saturday morning. The flames made such rapid progress that none of the valuable contents of the mansion could be saved, with the exception of the plate, which the daughter narrowly escaped with their lives.

The Lord Provost and Magistrates of Perth have purchased from Sandy-street authorities in the demonstration in the Pleasure-walk on the occasion of the Prince of Wales's visit to Perth, on the 20th inst. The public have exercised in the most generous manner, and the residue of the fund will be handed over to the Lord Provost for charity.

There was a robbery of plate and other articles from the house of the Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, Rectory, Ashby-de-la-Zouch, last week. The thieves found entrance through the dining-room window. They carried off the plate chest from the butler's pantry, and, breaking open the lumber room, a quantity of clothes from the Warden's dressing-room, and some blankets and linen from the housekeeper's.

A notable event took place at Oldham on Monday. About twenty years ago a lad of the name of Ashton was sent to Oldham in celebration of his eldest son attaining his majority. The festivities were held at the Angel Inn, and the proprietor, Mr. Ashton, by his energy and personal consumed would have stocked a large retail establishment. There was a ball in the evening. Mr. Ashton's health was drunk with enthusiasm.

The Halifax Exchange, formed about three weeks ago, was opened on Monday. It is the property of a company of local merchants and manufacturers of the place. The Mayor briefly addressed the gentlemen present, afterwards declaring the building open. Mr. Joseph Akroyd and Mr. John Crossley, the ex-Mayor. The exchange was well attended all day, and the arrangements appeared to give great satisfaction. Dinners will be held in the large hall at the Townhall, and will be open every day.

Quite a panic has been caused in Yorkshire by the incendiary fires, which continue their nefarious work. Last week there were three attempts, and on Saturday night there were two more attempts. One was fired at the supposed incendiary, but without effect. The local papers contain advertisements offering rewards, but, as yet, nothing has come of similar kind, is used before applying the match to the stacks. Yesterday week a library committee was appointed at Bradford, and a rate of a penny is charged with setting fire to stacks at Huggate, on the 21st of December. He stands remanded.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has appointed William M. Burke, M.A., to be Professor of Ecclesiastical History, and Public Registrar for Ireland. The Evening Mail mentions the appointment as highly desirable in the interests of the Irish Church, and especially of the clergy and the medical profession. Dr. Burke is a son of the old family of Burke of Derrymore, Co. Galway, and has attained a high rank in the Dublin bar, thus furnishing another instance of the frequent promotion of the English, Irish, and Scotch people of that country by the present Lord Lieutenant Vi.

Sir Stafford Northcote has been addressing a meeting at Exeter on various matters connected with the Government, with regard to the Government grants to schools of art. The hon. Baronet thought the recent proposal to abolish the grants very extreme, but he would not, at the same time, be astonished that there was a good deal to be said for the recent proposal. The Government, he said, had made a most interesting figures from a Parliamentary return to show the progress we have made in the population, and the number of persons receiving cultivated taste. Taking the exports for the period between 1840 and 1862, he found that in that time the value of manufactured goods exported had more than 125 per cent, it had been nearly 200 per cent in those particular articles which showed a cultivated taste in design.

The annual dinner of the Ancient Order of Druids at Oxford took place yesterday week, when Mr. Cardwell, M.P., presided over a large trade speeches. Mr. Cardwell expatiated on the prosperity of the country, and said that, in spite of the unfavourable harvest, the commercial returns had been quite up to the average. The question of Reform in question raised by it. He then adverted successively to Poland, the projected congress, and the Danish question, dwelling with great warmth on the fact that last summer would not leave us inert. In conclusion, the right hon. gentleman alluded to the great progress which had been made in education. Much, he said, has been our condition, and how buoyant our revenue. Mr. Neate followed; and, upon the health of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland being proposed, with him requiring the congress, but thought absolute silence on the Polish question would be best. Mr. Cardwell, responding, said Mr. Collins is the brother of the Lord Lieutenant that it should be treated on a par that, while it would contribute to the adornment of the city, it would associate the memory of the poet with the University in which his early studies were pursued. The assemblage was afterwards addressed by his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, who pronounced an eloquent eulogium on Goldsmith.

Lord Charles Innes Ker, son of the Duke of Roxburghe, having attained the majority of twenty-one years of the inhabitants of Kelso celebrated the occasion by ringing the town and church bells and decorating the streets with evergreens and flags. In the evening, by the permission of the Kelso Cricket Club, of which Lord Charles is president, dined together in honour of the occasion, and in the evening a ball was given to the retainers at Floors Castle. A substantial dinner was also provided by the Duchess of Roxburghe to the inmates of the Combination Poorhouse.

The annual meeting and drawing, in connection with the Manchester Art-Union took place last Saturday, at the Royal Institution, Mosley-street—the Mayor of Manchester (J. M. Bennett, Esq.) in the chair. The Mayor stated that 11,377 shares had been sold, realising £1,137, out of this amount would be distributed in prizes, besides which there were four boxes or contributions of £1 each. The following prizes were awarded:—No. 1 can £40; two £20; two £15; two £12; twelve £10; five £7; fourteen £5; and twenty-four £3. The number of tickets sold exceeded the considerable increase over last year.

On Saturday, at the house of Miss Collins, at Stamford, the bolter was being heated for a bath, when the pipes being frozen so that the steam could not circulate, it exploded, killing a young gentleman, Arthur Barston, on the spot, and so injuring the cook that she was conveyed to the hospital in the evening, in a state of insensibility. The bolter, which was the boiler was situated were blown out, and nearly everything in the place was broken. The house belongs to Mr. Thompson, boiler supplied by Messrs. Andrew Barclay's Parsonage, Bradford, seriously injuring two servants, one dangerously, and the other slightly, and also Mr. Barston's son to the amount of £50.

A meeting of the magistrates of Surrey was held on Tuesday to consider the appointment of a Roman Catholic Chaplain to the Wandsworth House of Correction. The Rev. Mr. Hutchinson had already appointed the Rev. Mr. M'Dermott, a Roman Catholic priest, but Mr. Austin, not satisfied with this, moved that Mr. Carbery be appointed Chaplain, at a salary of £150 a year. Mr. Carbery, on the other hand, moved that the appointment of Mr. M'Henry by the visiting justices be confirmed, with a remuneration of £50 a year, in addition to the salary of £150 as Roman Catholic priest, and afterwards altered to a fixed salary of £100 a year, in which case it was carried by a majority of 19 to 17. The same subject was discussed at the Staffordshire Sessions on Monday. The motion there for the appointment of a Chaplain was carried by a majority of 27 to 21, but Mr. Peel, M.P., said rejected by 31 votes to 27.——A similar question occupied the Berkshire Sessions on Tuesday. The Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, the Protestant Chaplain, moved that Mr. Carbery be appointed, by a majority of two votes. It is the opinion of the Court that the visiting justices should have the power of appointing Chaplains to the prisons of the county, and not the Court, which is the constitutional action of that Act." A motion was afterwards submitted by Mr. Morley, that the Treasury should be applied to for the necessary sanction, should to future take place at Reading. A long discussion ensued, and the motion was carried by a majority of 31 to 27.

On Monday evening, the Mayor of Great Yarmouth (Mr. R. Clement) convened a meeting of the Council, for the purpose of taking steps to relieve the widows and fatherless children left destitute in consequence of the loss of the steamer Lifeboat, which capsized in a gale of wind on the night of the commencement of last month. The Mayor said the Government had very promptly awarded £100 to the widow of the coxswain whose body, in search of the missing smacks, was found, after taking on board two experienced masters of smacks, the Lifeboat, and her crew of fourteen men, all of whom perished in every direction where it was at all probable that the smacks might be fallen in with. The Lifeboat was one of the largest and finest, and had only been out on that fatal trip because the Lowestoft Lifeboat, which was the nearest, had not windows and ninety-four children. Lessons were given to the children dependents upon the fund. He felt sure that large contributions would come from various sources, and he suggested that a subscription-list should be at once opened. A list was then opened, and the Mayor headed it with the sum of the bereaved. The meeting was addressed by the Minister of the parish (the Rev. R. B. Cobbold), Mr. Sheriff Palgrave, Mr. Alderman Worship, Mr. Sheriff Palgrave, Mr. E. R. Lacon, Bart, M.P., and other gentlemen; and it was determined that subscriptions should be received by the Mayor, persons desirous of paying over to their immediate distribution. About £200 was subscribed in the room, and the total sum of £1,000 was fixed as the amount to be raised. The Mayor, Mr. E. R. Lacon, Bart, M.P., Mr. R. Gurney, Mr. E. Worship, Mr. Sheriff Palgrave, &c. &c. When the pressing necessities of the case have been relieved, it is proposed to invest the remainder in a permanent fund, in order to meet contingencies and emergencies of this kind.

LAW.—At the Epiphany Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the county of Warwick, opened at Aylesbury on Monday, the business assumed a more gratifying tint than the calendar was blank. There was not a single grand jury case to be considered, and only a few cases of assault from crime were brought before the magistrates. The most important case was that of Catherine Ernstrom, a Swedish woman.——Instead of being committed, the worthy magistrate gave the prisoner an opportunity of becoming a tectotaler, and on her promising that she would not get drunk and not to take out the hood she had signed the pledge for twelve months, he was discharged. Mr. Ernstrom gave a donation to the poor.

At the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions, on Monday, there was a long discussion on the subject of the Chaplaincy to the County Prison, which terminated in the appointment of the Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, recommended by the Local Committee on the question, and expressed a hope that the Government would be prevented, by the action of the magistrates, from recommending Mr. Carbery (Lord Dudley), however, said he believed the Government did not intend to touch the question. He (Lord D.) was of opinion that the system of separate discipline took place it would be by the individual zeal and the good sense of the various chaplains appointed.

The Earl of Carnarvon, it may be remembered, at the time when the prevalence of garotting was the subject of attention in prison debate, moved that the Winchester benefit magistrates to get a more stringent code of regulations for the punishment of that offence. Lord Carnarvon's motion was lost in the House on the ground that the existing law was sufficient. Nothing further, and adopted by 47 votes to 19, in opposition to an amendment, in favour more to the discretion of the magistrates. The motion suggested that prison life should be curtailed of certain indulgences; that the convicts, for instance, should not receive their tobacco, with entertainment for their amusement; that the hours of sleep should be reduced, and the beds made less comfortable; that the prisoners should be compelled not to labour only at the hours of labour; and that the dietary should be revised; and that the prisoners should be kept in solitary confinement during the whole term.

At the General Quarter Sessions of Birmingham, on the 28th ult., Mr. E. D. Mayer, Q.C., Recorder, in addressing the jury, said that, in the course of things, on the present occasion, there were only a few cases to be tried, and the said) two short; and, being too short, the result is that prisoners come forth, and again, and again, and again. He had long felt would be done me, I find cases in which prisoners have been previously convicted, either before Justices, or at the Sessions, and in which sentences have been passed to operate on the present occasion, for trial. I have before me the record of a female prisoner who has been convicted eight times previously, and who is now up on the present occasion. These facts show that punishments as they are now administered are not of a deterrent character, and are inadequate to meet the ends they are intended to serve. He afterwards adverted particularly to the crimes of passing bad money, and to the practice of which he had seen so much, of the utterers of counterfeit coin employing children, and so exposing them to temptation.

On the conclusion of the case of Mr. Alexander Gilchrist, Mr. Alexander Greenie, on reporting himself at the office on leaving duty, was charged by the Lord-mayor with having informed that there was a copy of theft or receipt of theft against him, and that his house must be searched. This operation was then performed by Inspector Hayes, and Mr. Greenie was found in an almost incredible quantity of shop goods of various kinds, including jars and bottles of liquor, and also a large quantity of jewellery, watches and similar kinds. In short, of the various kinds of liquor in some dozens of jars and bottles, and of the various kinds of goods in some dozens of brown holland bags, and of the various kinds of articles in some dozens of the finer articles of ladies' wearing apparel, the selection in this department being from cotton and linen to the finest lady's quit worth perhaps, and the value of the articles amounting to some £50. There was also a miscellaneous collection of articles, the appearance of "rods" leading to carpenters' tools. It is estimated that the total value of the articles seized in the search will amount to £100. The prisoner remains in custody.

The Essex magistrates assembled at Lewes have been discussing the question of the Chaplaincy to the County Prison, and have come to a decision for those who have been in the habit of visiting high. They resolved to call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the facilities which were alleged to be afforded to the escape of prisoners from the gaol. The pugilists who took part in the fight were to have been tried at Lewes on Wednesday. But, on the application of the counsel for the Government, the trial to the next session, in order that he might have time to prepare for their defence. The defendants consented to the postponement, and the magistrates acceding, the case stands over.

At the General Quarter Sessions for Pembroke there boys were charged with robbery. The jury returned the following explanation with their verdict:—"We find the prisoners guilty, but the evidence is not sufficiently clear against Kennedy clear against Kennedy to convict him." The Recorder sentenced boys to several terms of imprisonment.

The coroner Tuesday has been removed to Bethlehem Hospital. The inquiry of the commissioners sent down by the Home Office was limited to the present state of his mind, and had no reference to the decision of the jury that he was legally responsible for his acts at the time of the murder.

The magistrates at the Derbyshire County Sessions have expressed their disapproval of the respite of George Victor Townley. They assume that he is insane, and that he will be confined during her Majesty's pleasure. This demand was made in the shape of a memorandum addressed to Sir George Grey, which was adopted at the sessions on Tuesday.

The coroner Joseph Eskrigge, entrusted to death for the murder of the woman Watterson at Guildford, has been reprieved.

On Saturday morning the extreme sentence of the law was carried out at Cambridge on the criminal John Green, convicted of having murder on Elizabeth Brown at Willingham.

"SCENE FROM 'DORA.'"

MR. A. H. BURR's picture of the reconciliation scene in Tennyson's "Dora" was, to our mind, the most admirable work in the last Exhibition of the Royal Academy, by any artist comparatively little known previously. Many a picture of a more sensational or eccentric character—many a work by a member of some clique or by some well-known hand—many a painting which has had some advertitious aid from puffery and puctuosity, and hurn the talk of the season—has had less rare and essential excellence. We remember nothing finer in the whole exhibition than that rugged head of old farmer Allen, with the writhing of the hard muscles of the face, the tearful eyes, and clasped mouth—presenting so true an index of the contention between stern, resentful pride and newly-awakened remorse—hopeless regret and yearning paternal affection. The successful rendering of that most difficult thing in art—mixed emotion—is the more remarkable, because the artist places the old man (and, by-the-way, suggestively and poetically) with his back against the cheerful daylight of the window, and illumines his features only with the reflection from the fire over which at his desolate hearth he so bitterly broods. The expressions and gestures of Mary and Dora show equal insight and power of representing the unspoken but unmistakable language of the heart. Nor are any of the technical qualities of the picture inferior to its high mental characteristics.

We need hardly remind the reader of those points of Tennyson's poem to be borne in mind, in order to realise the incident of the picture; yet the attempt to do so may be excused even if unnecessary. The stern old farmer Allen had, then, we must remember, set his heart on a match between his son William and Dora, the daughter of a brother, from whom he had parted in anger, but for whose sake (the brother having died abroad) he had bred her. Dora would have been meekly obedient to her benefactor's wishes, but the son, "because he had been always with her, liked not Dora," and refused to wed her; whereupon old Allen harshly threatened to expel him the house; for which, however, the son did not wait, but hired himself to work in the fields, and, "half in love, half spite," married Mary, a labourer's daughter. By her he had a boy, and not long after distress overtook William and he died. Meanwhile the farmer had cautioned Dora that if she spoke to William or his wife his home should be none of hers.

"My will is law," said the ruthless old man. Nevertheless, on William's death Dora secretly assisted and at length went to Mary, and, with the beautiful unselfishness of her woman's heart, sought, by bringing the child under the farmer's notice, to make him relent to mother as well as child. But when Allen saw the boy he taxed Dora and "the woman" with playing a trick upon him, and, as Dora's reward, took the boy, but told her to "go home and never see him more." Then the widow said she would not suffer Dora to take her trouble, but both should go to Allen: Mary should ask him to take Dora back, and if he refuse both should reclaim the child—lest he be "taught to slight his mother;" and they should work for him until he be of age to help them. The old farmer they find—as the painter represents; and the story of William's death at last softens the old man into a passion of remorse. The denouement of this domestic drama, or idyl, is that

> Those four sheds
> Within our house together; and as years
> Went forward, Mary took another mate;
> But Dora lived unmarried till her death.

A more simple, touching story than Tennyson's "Dora" is hardly to be found in the language, and we wonder painters have not more frequently gone to it for subjects. Though sad, it has no trace of the bitter melancholy and morbid introspection often characteristic of the poet. The phraseology is strictly appropriate to common peasant life, and as plain and idiomatic as that used in Wordsworth's tales.

"SCENE FROM TENNYSON'S 'DORA,'" BY A. H. BURR.

WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.

It was observed, in a recent article in this Journal, that the difficulty of the biographer of an author increases with the literary success of the subject of the memoir. The remark holds specially good in the case of the great man whose Portrait we now present (from a photograph recently taken by Mr Herbert Watkins, of Regent-street), and would render additionally welcome by the communication of a few memorial lines. Born a gentleman, educated at a University, and very soon induced to devote himself to authorship—an occupation which, after a determined but not disagreeable struggle, gave him fame and prosperity—Mr. Thackeray underwent few of the adventures which he has described so well, or either of a rougher order. Nor did his well-regulated mind permit him to indulge in the passions, follies, or tentative efforts which have made the lives of so many men hard living but agreeable reading. Sir Walter Scott's history as an author is varied by the story of a mystery more wonderfully kept than that in any of the sensation tales of our day, and by the story of a grand speculation which brought about a ruin more nobly repaired than ever was similar imprudence atoned for. Byron's life was full of real romance, subjected into mock romance by the vanity and mystifying tendencies of the man and by the malevolent propensities of those who refused to see the diamond because it was set in hasp and backed with tinsel. In the story of Burns we have a constant and painful struggle of genius with frailty, and are everywhere reminded, as in the noble lines of Marlowe,

> How angels, in their crystal armour, fight
> A doubtful battle with our tempted thoughts.

And we doubt not that when the lives of many men of the present day, who have attained much literary eminence, though far less than Thackeray, come to the press, it will be seen that living authors, like their betters, "have had losses." But in Thackeray's career, so far as the world can ever know it, there is little of which a biographer can make points. The story of his inner life and troubles would doubtless have been one of deep interest. The loss of fortune, and a still severer trial to his loving nature—a trial to which this is our first and last reference—must have given him hours and hours of care and of sorrow; and, had he chosen to place these on record, and (after the fashion of sundry French and English egotistical psychologists) to lay bare his own soul to the world, we might have had an autobiography inferior to none in that special interest which self-dissection, performed by a master's hand, must ever offer. But he has not done this, and none can presume to supply what he has chosen to withhold. It was not that he shunned the world's eye—we all feel at this moment how endeared he was to us by his delightful habit of treating us all as his friends, and of confiding to us his "little miseries," telling us how discourteous were some of the small enemies who attacked him, and how unreasonable were the small friends who besieged him. He was of much too healthy a mind to fear to walk about in his habit as he lived in private, and he never shrouded himself in mysteries, nor broke upon us, at stated seasons, in a blaze of glory. Simple, natural, and a gentleman, he was ever as frank as those who live in good society are usually found. But his great griefs he kept to himself and would have instinctively recoiled from the idea of making money or fame by a revelation of the pulsations of a troubled heart. Hence, his outside life having been without adventure, and his inner life having been a secret between his Maker and himself, his biographer has little to tell save what all know.

The "grand country" may add his name to the roll of great, and brave, and good men who have come from Yorkshire. His father was in the civil service of the East India Company; and his mother, who has lived to behold a people in sorrow for the son who was so devoted to her, is understood to claim a descent of equally sturdy English character from the real old English who inhabit the principality. So he is England's by every right of pedigree. His grandfather was a clergyman of the Established Church. William Makepeace Thackeray was born in Calcutta, in the year 1811, and soon came to this country. He was a Charterhouse boy and a Cambridge man. His last public appearance was at the Charterhouse dinner, and he gave the time-honoured Latin toast (which prays for prosperity to the great foundation) with a heartiness which was sadly remembered by some who heard him, and who stood by his open grave a few days later. He has not made much formal use of his college experiences, but they crop up, ever and anon, in his writings; and in that delightful "Shabby Genteel Story," the foundation upon which, years after, he based the history of "Philip," we find some early sketches of disreputable collegians. But he keep good men and true while at Cambridge, and preserved their friendship till the hour when friendship is ended.

Thackeray's own inclination was for the life of an artist. To his last day he was an earnest and devoted lover of art and of its professors; and it is remarkable that, large as was the number of distinguished men of his own calling who came round him, the friends he was most proud of as artists was almost as large. There stood Millais and Maclise; and Richmond and Leslie; and Frank Stone; Cruikshank; Leech and Tenniel, and Doyle; Munro, Du Maurier, Walker, and Phillips, and others whose faces we saw at faces at rare art such as Thackeray, whose genius was so many-sided, does not always arise to the mind. He had ever the largest praise for the artist who had made a special study, with kindred taste, for him who was struggling on upward course, and the more open hand for the artist who was struggling against adverse fortune. Intending to educate himself for painting, he travelled much, and, as happens to many men, he was not long in discovering that the finest and wisest manner for another art than that which he thought he was studying. And again and again he returned gratefully and fondly to the very last. He was fortunate, we think, in not beginning authorship when too young. He had not, as Douglas Jerrold said, "to take down the shutters before there was anything in the shop windows." He had been well educated, had seen much of the world, had seen much of the world, and had his mind ennobled and enriched by the study of art, where she shows proudest, before he took pen in hand. Hence, an observer keenly alive to the best and to the earliest writings there is an absence of strain and flutter, and a composed and earnest tone. He knew that he had a message to the world, and he did not find it necessary to beat out his gold into the thinnest leaf. He knew that what he had to say was important, hence he had no recourse to devices or affectations to attract attention; and he knew that he had to say it as well as he could well, and hence he told it in his own manner, and calmly waited the acceptance by the hearers. We do not say that we sympathise with those who have not possessed his advantages and who have had to learn to rid themselves, one by one, of the faults peculiar to youth; Thackeray was so singularly free. It is greatly to a writer's praise that he has taught himself what Thackeray knew and practised. We merely dwell upon a pleasant memory of the finish and composure of his early style. It strengthened with his strength, and, long before the end came, had been universally recognised as the purest and best English of the day.

Strong, without rage; without o'erlowing, full.

Henceforth the story of his life is little more than a recital of the dates of his works. Before he became famous he wrote for many of the journals; and a brilliant, as yet unpublished, contribution to the editor of the Examiner, has revealed the fact that the brilliant pen of Thackeray assisted many of the most remarkable articles for which that journal obtained a reputation which it has now regained. In Fraser's Magazine, however, he found a more congenial field. In Fraser's Magazine, however, he found a more congenial field. In Fraser's Magazine, however, he found a more congenial field improvements over the wooden armour-clads already built are to be introduced. One of these is the erection of an iron skin of 14-inch iron throughout a certain length of the vessel's broadside. This, however, is not intended to be made on the target well, however, determine the form of construction which will ultimately be carried out in the Lord Warden; but the Admiralty have decided that she shall be plated a certain length and height with plates of a greater thickness than those bolted to the sides of the Royal Oak, Caledonia, and the other ironclads. In the construction of the Lord Warden an important improvement will be made by Mr. Reed, in the placing of a power-line board of heavy guns on the keel of the ship—an improvement which has been altogether omitted in the heavy vessels of the present navy.

The Ordnance Select Committee have recommended that the gun-trial at the mouth of the Lancaster steaming vessel shall be carried out, as the recent action at Kagoshima has confirmed the experience gained by the experiments at Shoeburyness, of the value of shell-guns against iron ships. The explosion of the Armstrong gun at the mouth of the Lancaster, which blew off the breech-screw and injured the men who were at work in the gun-room, has brought the proposed trial before the public with a considerable degree of interest. The gun which is to be used is one of the 9-pounders, which, with the exception of the 12-pounders, are the only guns of the Armstrong pattern which have been tested with the heavy charges of powder which are now used in the navy. The gun is a 9-pounder, 6 cwt., 7 ft. 6 in. long, rifled on the Armstrong system, with a bore of 3 in., and a shell of 8 lb. weight. The charge of powder is 2 lb. 8 oz., and the range with 5 degrees elevation is 4,200 yards. The gun is to be fired at a target placed at a distance of 200 yards, and the effect of the shell will be carefully noted. The target will consist of a section of the Lancaster's broadside, with the iron skin of 14-inch thickness, and the wooden backing of 18 inches. The shell will be fired with the full charge of powder, and the effect will be carefully noted. THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

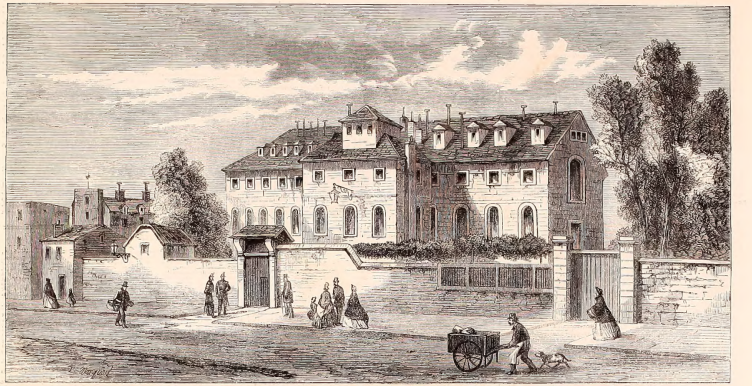
The 2nd, or Inland Revenue, Company (Captain Kenia's) of the Civil Service corps were engaged in a match at Wimbledon, on Tuesday, for the Inverness Challenge Cup, with the 1st (Capt. Hall's) company of the Queen's (Westminster), when they defeated by seven points, and they have held this cup for more than a twelvemonth. The Civil Service won by 466 to 459 points—five each away. Fifty-five marksmen were present. The 2nd Civil Service corps will next contend for the Queen's Prize, 1,000 points—possible score 1,600—at Wimbledon, on Tuesday, July 12.

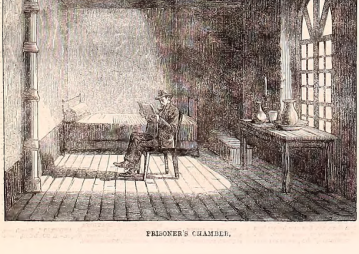
The annual course of musketry of the 63th Lancashire (Bootle) for the year 1863 has been completed. Seventy-five members fired altogether at the first and second practices, and sixty-four at the third. Forty-four have passed into the second class, and twenty into the third class. Lieutenant-Colonel Wilson, the 5th Administrative Battalion Lancashire Rifle Volunteers, commanded by Lieutenant Hamilton, was present at practice, and was inspected by Captain J. H. Suckling, the Adjutant of the Regiment, on the 4th inst.



The report for 1863 has just been issued by the council of the National Rifle Association. It contains the usual statistical matter, and is interesting on a record. The first scores of the shooting at Wimbledon, at the meeting and at the several meetings of the year, are given, and these will be useful to every marksman, by enabling him to compare the conditions of firing and the numbers by which the scores were made in 1863. The price of the report has been wisely reduced from half-a-crown to one shilling.

The proposed arrangements for the Rifle Volunteer Meeting to be held this month at King's College, London, are completed. At the first meeting, on the 15th inst., Mr. W. H. Gregory, M.P., commanding the 1st Yorkshire Volunteer Rifles, will preside, and the following subjects will be discussed:—Entries, by-laws, and regulations for the ensuing year; 1864. Announcements beforehand by bills and advertisements—forms for publication afterwards. Signalling—flags, rockets, and lights. Signalling shots—interruption by weather. Time-disputes—trigger-pull—disqualifications—prizes. The above in connection with ammunition, rifles, telescopic, carps, and private matches. The subjects for consideration on the second day (Jan. 21) are:—Target and range—distances, size, and material of targets; size and shape of bull's-eye, centres, and other marks—colours of the same. Firing—position, rest, and aim—number fired at the several and colonel meetings—number fired at any one target—motion at unknown distances, or without back-sight. Marking: safety, celerity, speed—telegraphic bulls-eyes and centres—signals—flags—rockets and sale of ammunition. Refreshments: railway and hotels. Accidents and surgery: Volunteer Medical Staff—Army Medical Department. Models and photographs connected with the above; Volunteer Institute. On the third day the Duke of Wellington will preside, and the following subjects will be considered:—Matches with (a) service rifles and carbines; (b) service bore rifles; (c) rifles of any bore; matches with (a) rifle and carbine sights, wind-gauges, positions, and rests. Matches with rifles of different bores. Matches with rifles of different sights. Matches with rifles of different triggers. Matches with rifles, bridges, and rests. Matches with rifles of artillery; matches with heavy guns will be discussed in sub-section. The concluding address will be delivered by the Duke of Wellington, after the dinner in the evening. Lord Bury, M.P., will preside.

The following official circular from Earl De Grey and Ripon, Secretary of State for the Department of Colonies, has just been issued from the War Office:—"I have the honour to inform you that the Queen has been graciously pleased to the system which is followed by many clerks of lieutenancy of granting the re-appointment of officers of the militia on the day on which they cease, as well as afterwards, when the gentlemen who succeed to the vacant commissions are gazetted; and that it is not considered necessary that resignation should be notified a second time. I deem it expedient that the practice above mentioned should be henceforth discontinued, and I therefore request that you will give directions to the clerk of lieutenancy of the county under your jurisdiction to attach a copy of this letter to the notice of resignation in the London Gazette until some other gentleman has been appointed to succeed the officer who resigns, when it will be sufficient for the following form:—'Lieutenant Richard Smith resigns his commission,' vice C. D. resigned. Dated December 1, 1863. I take this opportunity of pointing out to you that considerable inconvenience has been occasioned from the manner in which the memoranda in the Gazette are frequently worded, and to request that in future the same memoranda be worded in the same terms as the letter of approval from this office, and this in the case of appointment to corps not commanded by lieutenant-colonels, the words 'not to be inserted, without mention of the administrative battalion of which the corps may form a part, or of the lord-lieutenant's name.' I think it is here further to request that the date which the officer's commission bears may be inserted in the Gazette, as it is often of the greatest importance to have the honour of the Queen, Dr. Gen. of Ordnance.



The following War Office circular from Lord Hartington to commanding officers of volunteer corps has also been issued:—"Sir,—With reference to volunteer Act, 1863, and to the Rifle Volunteer Consolidation Regulations, 1863, I am directed by Earl De Grey and Ripon to inform you that his lordship considers that the number of officers in the several volunteer corps should find it unnecessary to conclude that the number of the respective corps or companies should be made regularly every month, by may not be necessary in determining the exact number to be made regularly every month, by may not be necessary in determining the exact number to be made regularly every month, by may not be necessary in determining the exact number to PARIS DEMOLITIONS.—THE HOTEL DES HARICOTS, OR PRISON OF THE NATIONAL GUARD OF PARIS.

THE PRISON OF THE NATIONAL GUARD OF PARIS, IN THE RUE DE LA GARE.

EVER since 1852 the National Guard of Paris has been only partially organised. At that period several battalions were dissolved on account of their well-known "Red" tendencies, and it was thought advisable to disarm the Guard in such quarters as were likely, if not to trouble order, at least not to aid in the suppression of tumult. On account of this disorganisation, and perhaps from another motive not necessary to mention here, service in the National Guard has become rather a matter of indifference or neglect even in the arrondissements where no suspicion of general disaffection could exist, and a great number of refractaires, or persons seeking to evade the service, have been sent from time to time to the Maison d'Arrêt of the Garde Nationale for a few hours—a punishment to which no ignominy whatever attaches, and which is to some a more agreeable pastime than that of mounting a guard to all intents and purposes useless. Undoubtedly, the National Guard, as an institution in France, would be most useful in the event of war, as liberating the army from home duties; but the daily service of the few posts in Paris has really become an unnecessary and unpleasant disarrangement of the peaceful citizens in the pursuit of their business occupations. Hence the frequent intervention of the Conseil de Discipline de la Garde Nationale, which liberally distributes its condemnations of offending citizens to pass a certain number of hours in the Hôtel des Haricots, as the prison is facetiously called by the members of the Garde themselves, by reason of the solemn item that figures in the tariff of condiments affixed to the wall of each cell—"Haricots blancs à la maître d'hôtel, 50 centimes." This same Conseil de Discipline also punishes those who are duly incorporated into the ranks; and absence from guard, disobedience to orders, neglect of duty, insolence to officers, or audacity are sure to lead to a long procès-verbal drawn up by the rapporteur, or prosecutor, followed by reprimand, fine, or an invitation to pay a more or less lengthened visit to the realms of haricots. The term of imprisonment extends from twelve hours to eight days, so far as the powers of the Court are concerned; but in rare cases, yet only after a certain number of ordinary condemnations, the guard becomes amenable to the police correctionnelle, and to a consequent increase of punishment. Generally, however, the punishments are very light, and frequently annexed; and the offenders can choose their own time (within a reasonable limit) for the performance of the durance vile, the prison being open at certain hours every day for the reception of "convicted visitors."

EXPERIMENTS WITH THE ARMSTRONG 600-POUNDER AGAINST THE WARRIOR FLOATING TARGET.

THE WARRIOR TARGET AS SEEN FROM SHOEBURYNESS WHEN STRUCK BY THE 600-POUND SHELL FIRED FROM THE ARMSTRONG SHUNT-GUN "BIG WILL."

The approaching extension of the station of the Orleans Railway will necessitate the demolition of the Hôtel des Haricots, and the consequent destruction of a large collection of drawings, paintings, and verses, drawn, painted, and inscribed on the walls of several of the cells, and signed by such names as Decamps, Gavarni, Gustave Doré, Dumnier, Janet, Bertall, Théophile Gauthier, Henry Murger, Arsène Houssaye, Alfred de Musset, and a host of other celebrities who, even in their hours of punishment, contributed something towards the entertainment and instruction of future occupants.

Were it not for the associations thus connected with the actually existing prison of the National Guard at Paris, its architectural aspect, interior and exterior, would have stood a fair chance of passing into unpictorial oblivion, so far, at least, as the pages of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS are concerned. But a special interest attaches to this little prison-house; and but few hotels in France, even the most aristocratic, can boast of having had within their walls so many "illustrations," some of whom had offended simply for the purpose of visiting the works, literary and artistic, now consigned to destruction. Formally there was much joviality among the inmates, who were allowed to mess together; and, no longer than eight years ago, Alexander Duman, Paul Féval, Eugène Guinot, and Méry dined in the Hôtel des Haricots, at the same table; and the repast is said to have been one of the most sparkling on record.

The site for the new Maison d'Arrêt has not yet been fixed on; but, wherever it may be, it will never be able to compete with its humbler predecessor in the prestige surrounding the names of its occupants, whose transient but clever productions had rendered the Hôtel des Haricots one of the most interesting interiors of the Parisian spital.

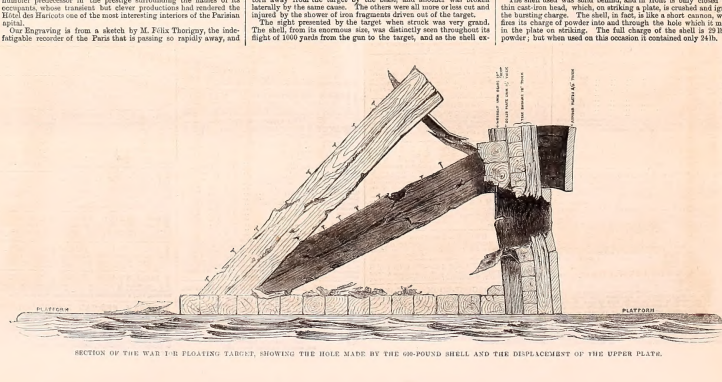
Our Engraving is from a sketch by M. Félix Thorigny, the indefatigable recorder of the Paris that is passing so rapidly away, and involving in its demolition the destruction of a vast mass of charming remembrances dear to those who delight in old associations and lively chronicles of things gone by.

THE 600-POUNDER ARMSTRONG GUN.

IN our Number of the 26th ult. we gave Illustrations of Sir Wm. Armstrong's 600-pounder gun and the floating target which had been built to represent the side of the Warrior. Since the experiment to which these Illustrations referred the target has undergone a most careful survey; and, pursuing the subject, we are now able to give additional particulars of the effect produced by the penetration and explosion of a single shell.

On taking the target to pieces the shattering effect was found to have extended far beyond the limits of the hole; and it has been reported in the Times that, "notwithstanding the enormous strength and solidity with which it was constructed, and the parts bolted and riveted together, the plates of the target are so torn and rent, and the timber backing so much shivered, that no repairs will ever render it fit to be again experimented upon.

Previous to the practice the timber supports at the back of the target were covered with planks strongly nailed to the timbers, so as to form a box or chamber similar to the space within a turret. The whole of three inclosing planks were torn off and blown away by the explosion of the shell. One of the massive timber struts was also torn away from the target by the blast, and another was broken laterally by the same cause. The others were all more or less cut and injured by the shower of iron fragments driven out of the target.



The sight presented by the target when struck was very grand. The shell, from its enormous size, was distinctly seen throughout its flight of 1060 yards from the gun to the target, and as the shell exploded an immense volume of smoke and flame instantly enveloped the target. Above the smoke pieces of plank were seen flying in the air, announcing the demolition of the box in the rear.

The annexed Engraving shows the appearance of the target and the sea immediately around it at the moment the shell burst; the fragments of the wood inclosure were sent into the air, and portions of the shell and the splinters were hurled into the surrounding water. This sketch was taken from a point in front of the barracks at Shoeburyness, and from it may be readily gathered an idea of the deadly nature of this ponderous missile.

Our second Engraving represents a section through the target as it would appear if cut vertically through the centre of the hole made by the shell; and it may not be out of place again to repeat that the target was composed externally of armour plating 4½ in. thick, resting upon and bolted to a solid backing of teak 18 in. thick, which backing was again supported by an inner plating and framework representing the body of the ship.

The shell appears to have exploded just as it entered the timber-backing, and it made a hole in the back of the target about four times as large as that in the front. The upper plate of the target, although not struck, was started by the force of the explosion fourteen inches forward from the face of the timber, drawing or breaking all its bolts. It would have fallen completely away, but for the obliquity of the target and the partial support it received from two or three of the broken bolts. The displacement of the armour plate and the damage to the timber backing is clearly shown in our Engraving.

The shell used was solid behind, and in front is only closed by a thin cast-iron head, which, on striking a plate, is crushed and ignites the bursting charge. The shell, in fact, is like a short cannon, which fires its charge of powder into and through the hole which it makes in the plate on striking. The full charge of the shell is 29 lb. of powder; but when used on this occasion it contained only 24lb.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE advices from the Continental bourses have either been favourable or unimportant during the week under review. The Bank return of £2,000,000 announced for publication has not altered the tone of Stock Exchange affairs on the whole, however, although the business done has been on a more extensive scale than for some time past, and the quotations have been slightly improved in value.

There has been a steady demand for accumulation at the Bank of England and in Consols, Exchequer Bonds, and the supply of stock has rather lowered. In the open market the quotations for the most approved securities are—

The demand for bullion for export purposes has not been, to any extent; nevertheless, but silver has sold readily, at 61½d. per ounce. Gold has been in fair request, and £1,000,000 sovereigns have been recently dispatched to the Continent. Mexican dollars have been realized at 4s. 10d.

At the last yearly meeting of the London Dock Company a dividend of 1s. 6d. was declared for the dividend of the Consols, and 2s. 6d. for that of the Eastern Counties.

THE SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN DIFFICULTY.

PRINCE FREDERICK CHRISTIAN AUGUSTUS, Hereditary Prince of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg, according to some the gerunder to, but in the opinion of others the rightful owner of, the dukedom of Schleswig-Holstein, is the son of Duke Christian of Augustenburg. He was born on the 6th of July, 1829; and was married, in 1856, to Princess Adelaide of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, whose mother is a daughter of the late Duchess of Kent by her first husband, and, consequently, half sister to Queen Victoria. The house of Hohenlohe-Langenburg belongs to the "mediatised" families of Germany. Prince Frederick is a Major in the Prussian service. There is little or nothing to record of this Prince, who has suddenly burst like a rocket upon the gaze of the world;—will it be to fall like the stick, or to shine a fixed star, of the sixth magnitude, in the political heavens? With the entry of Prince Frederick into the duchies, the Schleswig-Holstein question has passed into a new phase. He has taken up his residence in the land over which he claims to rule by the law of descent and by the choice of the people, and has assumed the title of Frederick VIII., Duke of Schleswig-Holstein. His arrival at Kiel has been greeted with intense popular enthusiasm, and his assumption of quasi-Royal power has been tacitly sanctioned by the federal commissioners. He has received congratulatory deputations from several places, and made replies full of confidence.

The Duke has issued the following proclamation:—

"Schleswig-Holsteiners,—When I announced to you that I had undertaken the government of the duchies of Schleswig-Holstein by virtue of the old law of succession of our country and of the Oldenburg House, the country was occupied by foreign troops. Relying before the German federal troops, whom you have joyfully greeted as liberators, they have now vacated the Duchy of Holstein.

"I have not hesitated to reply to your call. I fulfil a duty which cannot be neglected when I no longer delay to bear with you the cares of this serious time.

"Complications which existed before I entered on my government have caused the German Bund, for the purpose of preserving the national right, to take steps against the de facto power hitherto existing in Holstein. Commissioners of the Federation have undertaken the administration of the country.

"The federal execution, from the commencement, directed in no case against my government, has now become without object. I have never entertained a doubt that I should cause the rights of the country to be recognised and established to their full extent. I am convinced that the German Bund will also acknowledge that the reasons no longer exist which caused it to order federal execution.

"I entertain a well-grounded confidence that the present intermediary condition of affairs will only be of short duration, and cherish the expectation that my loyal subjects will respect the administration previously instituted by the Diet, and will avoid conflicts.

"Schleswig-Holsteiners, I need not say to you that I thank you for the love and devotion which you have displayed towards me. You stand by me with an unanimity and determination which will demonstrate to the world that my sovereign right finds a secure support in your free conviction, your patriotic love, and your inflexible will.

"With me, return thanks to Almighty God, who has hitherto guided us. He will also conduct us further. FRIEDRICH.

"Duke of Schleswig-Holstein.

"Kiel, Dec. 31, 1863."

Correspondence from the duchies is unanimous in describing the execution as having taken place without any disturbance of public order. An hour before the federal troops arrived at the different towns the Danish forces marched out; and, except for the difference of the uniforms, one would imagine that regiments were being relieved in the ordinary course of military duty. On the departure of the Danish troops Prince Frederick was proclaimed in most of the towns Duke of Schleswig-Holstein; the arms of Denmark were quietly taken down from the post-offices and custom-houses, and the tricolor flag hoisted in their place. Properly constituted committees have undertaken the management of the duties of the police and revenue departments, and have resolved to suppress any dispositions towards riot or disorder. The general administration of the duchy of Holstein is provided for by the commissioners of the Germanic Confederation, who have taken up their quarters at Altona. This town is situated on the right bank of the Elbe, adjoining Hamburg.

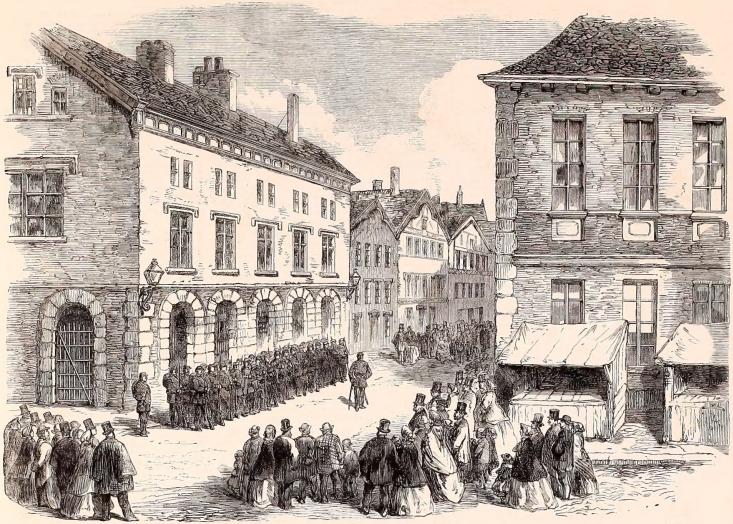
Our present Number contains seven Engravings, from sketches by our artist, in Holstein, of the federal execution in Altona. On the 24th ult. the Saxon contingent entered, with their band playing "Schleswig-Holstein, Sie umschwanden," through the Nobis Thor to the Townhall, and marched thence the Danish guard, and were at once received with great demonstrations of welcome. All the members of the different societies which work in the Schleswig-Holstein cause—namely, the new Riflemen's Club, the Turners, the Brethren-at-Arms, and others—turned out in great force. Duke Ferdinand of Augustenburg arrived in state in the presence of the entire population, as well as half that of Hamburg. A great change was effected in the appearance of the town after the departure of the Danes in the morning, as many of the houses were adorned with German and Schleswig-Holstein flags, which also waved from the old Council House; and in the afternoon a large crowd was moving about in a state of great excitement. The walls were covered with the Duke's proclamation, and the Saxons were in full force to welcome to the duchies, while Schleswig-Holstein cockades and scarfs were worn by many persons. Immediately on the arrival of the railway station, after an energetic speech from Dr. Callsen, a physician, it was found that the Hotel de la Ville and the Stadt Rom House was too small to contain the numbers who had assembled. The crowd then marched through the principal streets, with "Schleswig-Holstein."

The correspondent of one of our contemporaries writes as follows, on this subject, in a letter dated Altona, Dec. 25 :—



As I told you in my last, the "execution" has been got in. The German Diet has made its key, and "seized" the duchies in the name of the Bund. As I told you in the hands of the military authorities, ready either to be "bought" or to be knocked down—by the Austrian and Saxon troops, under the Prince of Augustenburg to rush upon the Danish troops, and to drive the Danes away. I saw the last of them; for, after I had watched them march off in their turn from the old Stadt House, I returned to my quarters, and after I had noted the final detachment drawn up, fully accoutred for the march, with their rear-guard of cavalry, and watched as they saw here—in front of the principal "guardhouse" in connection with the Nobis Thor—the last of the Danes, I left the place. Because I was present when one of the troops, who had been sent down to the Altona Gate, to see that the Danes left the town, came back to the German quarters, looked sad and sorry at the citizens as a man only can look and his those who had been his friends. The citizens of Altona—and I am proud to say it—have given proofs of courage that could naturally have been expected. I have heard of but few cases of serious illness of persons having epidemic fear and Danish sympathies, who could have been conducted in a decent and dignified manner. No sooner had the Danish army left Altona, and the town was in the hands of the commissioner deputed by the German Confederation, than some six or eight persons hastened to the house of Count Reventlow, where in almost every room a Danish officer had taken the Prince's Minister, as he is called) in Altona. This police functionary, it seems, was not to be found. He had fled from the wrath of the people against the Danes, and secured a refuge in the rooms of his Excellency, who now keeps a lower cellar in the Danish garrison. Several of the Danish officers, however, became, to the astonishment of all the world, the police-master of the capital of Holstein; so that the proper thing to do was to put the whole affair under the hands of the military, and to leave it to them to do the police service. However, to that as it may, it seems that last March or April the Reichsrath contrived to party to place certain persons in office who, their fellow-soldiers who had fallen in the battle of Colding and elsewhere in '48, had pelted contemptuously. "Himmelbau, head of police!" "Hahn, head of police!" best place, and sent some policemen to watch the ground, so that Reichsrath Hahn should not be pelted by any opinion that did not coincide with his own. business affairs. What will have said, no sooner had the Saxon troops entered the town than Herr Von Scheele, who was the highest civil personage in Altona, although a Holsteiner by birth, and who had been appointed and informed the police-master that he had to "clear out" from the town. People had known him. Personally I had not known him. Scheele reminded Wienecken that he had a small account to settle with him, and he settled the night before last, at which he had been a guest, by sending a bullet through the graves of his and Wimmacker's dead comrades. It was no time to go out in the streets without a revolver. Personally I was glad that Wienecken would be given up to Lynch law; no drawing forth his poste-monnaie, he put down on the table a pistol, and, pointing it at his head, fired. The ball went so rapidly as possible out of Altona, glad to save his neck at such a cost. I am told that Wienecken has left Altona, and is now in Hamburg, where, I am told, one of the former clergymen in connection with the Hospitalkirche, Altona, is also to be found. Although a Holsteiner by birth, he seems to have such strong sympathies with Denmark that, immediately after the Danish occupation of Altona, he was appointed at the railway station to keep order, and to say to his house in the Prussian-street, and would have roughly handled the writer, if not been for Mr. Burnett, who acted as my protector. Mr. Burnett is the guard over the body man, and placed him in a cab, with directions to the Prussian Consulate. Happily he escaped. Another Holsteiner, Herr Von Scheele, who was the highest civil personage in Altona, and who had been appointed and informed the police-master of the capital of Holstein; so that the proper thing to do was to put the whole affair under the hands of the military, and to leave it to them to do the police service. CURRENT LITERATURE.

Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile. By John Hanning Speke. (1 vol. William Blackwood and Sons.) Speke and Grant are names which will be henceforth for ever associated with one of the most memorable discoveries of an age remarkable for discovery. The nineteenth century has seen some stupendous events—steam, obedient to the intelligence of man, exerting its gigantic strength on land and water in countless ways; and even the storms lightning tamed and taught to carry messages; and even the storms and wind and rain of heaven no longer able to assail the earth unchecked and unchallenged. Hitherto, for the nineteenth century to establish the existence and the uselessness of that North-West passage which men have sought for in Arctic regions, and for which so much was expected; but it is a question whether the solution of even this problem will be more important than that of the Captains Speke and Grant. Old Father Nile, whom the grateful Egypt has worshipped as a god, whose annual rise and overflow of its waters periodically his fertilising waters upon their soil, whose source has been a puzzle for centuries to many and many a learned man, has been unravelled by the perils of all kinds, but whose headquarters seemed ever a mystery, has been traced to its source by the brave Speke and his companion of south adventure. For there is now no doubt but that he sallies forth upon his mission of fertilisation from the Lake Victoria N'yanza, discovered by Speke on the 30th June in 1858. Captain Speke once more set out for Africa to verify his prediction that in the newly-discovered lake would be found the source of the seven-mouthed river, having with him as comrade and fellow-labourer Captain J. W. Grant. The Captains Speke and Grant, by appointments to which the explorers were exposed in their intercourse with the tribes through whose country they had to pass, and by the wearisome diplomacy they had to practise towards capricious, wily, grasping, savage potentates, will be found graphically described in their journal. It is illustrated by about seventy-five excellent wood-cuts, chiefly from drawings by Captain Grant. These are engravings, chiefly from drawings by Captain Grant. These are interesting, more interesting and important relating to the manner in which the expedition was fitted out, to heights of stations between Zanzibar and Gore (about 50 miles from the coast of Africa), to the photos collected by Captain Grant between Zanzibar and Cairo. Of the latter Captain Speke says: "The most interesting are those of Usui, that was ever made by the dyeing process in the interior, west of Zanzibar. . . . Many people have seen Usui, the Wanyamwezi, and highly commended by Dr. Hooker, who regrets with myself that better facilities are not afforded to the study of natural history in foreign countries." Nor must the map by Captain Speke of Eastern Equatorial Africa be left out in due amount of praise, for every reader will find it of great assistance.

The Six Sisters of the Valley. By the Rev. William Beamley-Moore, M.A. (2 vols. Longmans.) This story is called an historical romance, and so to a great extent it is, for it is connected with the persecutions of the Waldenses, the unhappy inhabitants of the Waldensian valleys in the seventeenth century, and which are inscribed in letters of blood upon the mantlepiece of the history of the papal page of history. But a perusal of only a few pages is sufficient to show that the book is what it is called, "a romance upon horror; and the only end which can be gained appears to us to be to increase the hatred of Roman Catholics among Protestant nations. The title is due to a singular fact, recorded by Leger. Six brothers married six sisters; all of them had children, and the families, amounting in number to more than forty souls, lived at one with each other and, to their honour be it said, with their neighbours. Where is the Paradise? The disabilities of the Waldensians have, since 1848, been removed; but our author seems to think that service may be rendered to evangelisation if the Waldenses suffering as they have been subjected in the cause of religion in 1655. Those who agree with him will, no doubt, be attracted to the book. Those who do not will remain distant to all works of the kind; but, so far as we went, we can say that the author seems to have taken pains to be correct in fact, to write touchingly now and then, and melodramatically very often. If the author has not read "Adam Bede" and "The Mill on the Floss" he will have seen how possible it is to write an interesting historical romance, embracing religious questions, without making the story any of the personal bias which he has introduced. Such, however, as is evident from his preface, was not his object. He says that he was led to the Cassenova Mountains, which, "familiar to geographers for the last four hundred years, have remained in the same condition as when formed, virgin ground, with a virgin flora, a virgin climate—in fact, virgin all," until lonely ride or country walk induced him to search out the glorious heights which some others had attempted in vain. Captain Burton has never shown any disposition to conceal of his success, and of the difficulties which lay in the way of his success; and this is "a matter of evident taste." Mountain climbing cannot be distasteful to all works of the kind; but, so far as we went, we can say that the author seems to have taken pains to be correct in fact, to write touchingly now and then, and melodramatically very often. BURIAL OF THE LATE KING OF DENMARK: THE COFFIN BEING BORNE TO THE MAUSOLEUM AT THE CLOSE OF THE FUNERAL SERVICE IN ROESKILDE CATHEDRAL.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE KING OF DENMARK.

THE remains of his Majesty Frederick VII., having lain in state during seven days in the Castrum Doloris, or Mourning Hall, at the Royal Palace, Copenhagen (as shown in the Engraving in our last Number), were removed on the 16th ult. to Roeskilde, in the cathedral of which they were interred on the following day.

On Friday, the 16th ult., at noon, an immense cortège assembled at the palace, where a solemn service was performed, and at half-past one o'clock the coffin was removed and placed on the Royal hearse, drawn by eight horses, and the procession formed according to the Chamberlain's programme, issued from the great gate of the palace preceded by the Danish Guards, Court officials, Ministers, civil officers, municipal authorities, the high Judges, and members of Parliament, in carriages of state drawn by six horses. The Royal hearse, the late King's state carriage, drawn by six white horses and his crown conducted by Baron Stjernblad-Schaffalitzky Christian IX., in a carriage drawn by eight horses; the Crown Prince, in a carriage drawn by six horses; and the other Princes of the Royal Family, each drawn by six horses; many deputations, and a squadron of Hussars of the Guard. The naval and military and militia corps, as well as the guilds and Corporations, formed lines on the streets through which the cortège passed through the principal streets of the city, whilst all streets and squares were filled with immense spectators. On arriving, the procession had reached the Frederiksberg Alley, at four o'clock, it was formed, and the coffin, which was then carried, under escort, to the town of Roeskilde, about nineteen miles from Copenhagen. Along the line of route the principal Corporations were assembled, who pionely bent their heads as the solitary bier passed along. Every farm and cottage was hung with black and illuminated by lamps placed in the windows; and at the boundary of each district corps of peasants in their costumes received the procession from other districts and escorted the car on its journey.

The little town of Roeskilde was not reached until the 19th, the express-trains from Copenhagen soon filled the square in front of the railway station, where the Royal hearse and coffin stood, with those who were to form the procession. At half-past three the arrival of the Bishop Christian and all the Royal Princes, the procession was marshalled, and the procession of the Royal Family and venerable cathedral, and were met at the principal porch by the Bishop of Zeeland and a numerous body of the clergy who preceded the procession to the high altar, below which the sarcophagus was placed. The Cathedral, where the Diplomatic Body had previously assembled, was soon thronged, and the funeral service commenced with a cantata of Handel's, after which the Bishop Martensen, primate of the Danish clergy, preached most impressively, and, after the coffin had been removed to the royal mausoleum, concluded with prayers and the benediction.

The cathedral of Roeskilde contains the ashes of nearly all the Kings of the family of Oldenburg who, during four centuries, ruled the destinies of Denmark; and now it has received the mortal remains of Frederick VII., who was the last King of the ancient dynasty.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE EARL OF CHARLEMONT.

The Right Hon. Sir Francis William Caulfield, K.P., P.C., second Earl of Charlemont, Baron of Caledon, Viscount Caulfield, and Baron Charlemont, in the peerage of Ireland, and Baron Charlemont, in the peerage of Great Britain, a representative Irish Peer, Governor and Lord Lieutenant of the county of Tyrone, was the eldest son, by his wife Mary, daughter of Sir Ralph Gore, Bart., of Clare of Jamestown, Co. Leitrim, of Lieut.-Colonel James Caulfield, of the 88th Regiment, a celebrated partisan officer, by whom he was called to the Irish Peerage as Baron Charlemont, in the county of Armagh, in 1763, and created Viscount Charlemont, in the county of the City of Dublin, a representative Irish Peer, Governor and Lord Lieutenant of the county of Tyrone, was the eldest son, by his wife Mary, daughter of Sir Ralph Gore, Bart., of Clare of Jamestown, Co. Leitrim, of Lieut.-Colonel James Caulfield, of the 88th Regiment, a celebrated partisan officer, by whom he was called to the Irish Peerage as Baron Charlemont, in the county of Armagh, in 1763, and created Viscount Charlemont, in the county of the City of Dublin, a representative Irish Peer, Governor and Lord Lieutenant of the county of Tyrone, and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Armagh, in 1765, and Earl of Charlemont, in the county of Armagh, in 1777. He was born in 1728, and succeeded his father on the 4th of August, 1799. Much of the popularity that attached to his father descended to the son, who was equally distinguished worthy of it. Like his father, he was a liberal supporter of literature, and was inclined to take a prominent part in politics, the second Earl evidently considering that the duties of a nobleman were not confined to the battle-field or the cabinet, but that enlightenment was prospered. In private life his society was much coveted on account of his intelligence and courtesy, and no one was a better judge of literature and the fine arts. One of his last appearances in public in Dublin was when he, in his eighty-fifth year, presided at the meeting convened for the inauguration of the poet Tom Moore's statue, near College-green. The Earl married, first, in 1762, Anne, daughter and heiress of William Bermingham, Esq., of Dunsandle, in the county of Galway, a lady whose wit, fascination, and beauty are the theme of many a page of Moore and Barrow. By this lady he had issue three sons and two daughters, all of whom died, unmarried, either before the majority or just upon it. Secondly, he married, on the 13th of June, in the 28th ult., at his suburban house, Marino, Clontarf, near Dublin, and his remains were laid in Kensal-green, on the 30th ult., Lady Caroline Wilmot, daughter of Ireland being among his pall-bearers, interred, on the 31st ult., in his ancestral vault in the parish church of Donnybrook, by the side of his father, Viscount Caulfield, and his very eminent father. The Earl is succeeded by his only surviving brother, Colonel the Hon. James Caulfield, who was born in 1767. Hon. James Caulfield, Colonel of the Armagh Militia, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Armagh, and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Charlemont, who was born in 1767, and married, in the year 1810, Elizabeth Jane, only daughter of the Right Hon. Sir William Meredyth Somerville, Bart., the lately-created Lord Athlumney, by his wife, the Hon. Henry William Caulfield, becomes heir presumptive to his honours. The Hon. Henry Caulfield, of Hockley, in the county of Armagh, who died in 1862, the only brother of the late Earl of Charlemont, and father of the Earl who now succeeds, was a distinguished and deservedly popular officer, having fought and by all who knew him. Of him and the deceased Earl may well be said, "Nothing in their lives became them like the leaving it." Both were all very accomplished gentlemen, and left behind in Ireland sons, Elizabeth, when Sir Toby Caulfield, a distinguished officer in the service of Queen Elizabeth, and of her Majesty. Her successor, James Caulfield, son of the Colonel of Monaghan, and created Sir Baron Caulfield in 1620. This Peer's nephew, by special limitation the second Baron, was created Earl of the Earl just dead.

MISS CAMPBELL.

The lamented demise of this lady, Miss Alicia Campbell, occurred on the 25th ult., at her town house, 4, Chesterfield-street, May-fair. The deceased was the only child of the Historian Field Marshal Sir Colin Campbell, Lord Clyde, by his first wife, Miss Worsley, who was intended, as the only child of the late distinguished commander by giving her the rank of the daughter of a Baron. Deceased, who was born on the 20th of May, 1826, was in her 38th year, and has a testamentary disposition of property to the extent of earthly dignities, Lord Clyde, in all but his fame, is now indeed "dust and ashes."

Mr. BARROWS, ESQ.

William Barrows, Esq., of Bisley House and Bloomfield Ironworks, Bath, Somerset, who died on the 10th ult., in the sixty-fourth year of his age, was one of the largest manufacturers of iron in the county of Stafford, was upwards of two thousand of his workmen and neighbours attended his funeral, on the 15th, to testify their affection and respect for their late employer and friend. His loss is deeply felt not only by the inhabitants of Hinckley, where he resided, and by those in the vicinity of his extensive ironworks, but also generally as a useful public man. Mr. Barrows was a magistrate for the county of Stafford, and was for the last eleven years of the Borough of Hinckley. His time was spent in partnership with him; and from the experience they have gained, will be able to carry on the various ironworks with the same untiring energy and success.

VISCOUNT VALENTIA.

The Right Hon. Sir Arthur Annesley, Viscount Valentia, in the county of Kerry, Baron Mountnorris, of Mountnorris Castle, in the county of Armagh, in the Peerage of Ireland, and Premier Baronet of Ireland, was the eldest son, by his wife, Catherine, daughter and heiress of Admiral Sir Charles Hardy, of Arthur Annesley, of Bletchington Park, Oxfordshire, fourth in descent from Hon. Ben Francis, sixth son of Francis, first Viscount Valentia. He was born Nov. 26, 1785, and succeeded the late Viscount on the 8th ult. His Lordship was twice married, first, to Miss Elizabeth Cooper, second Earl of Coventry, by whom she had issue Valentia, July 23, 1811, and Elizabeth Jane, who died in 1838, and secondly, in 1841, to Miss Mary Ann Bolton, by whom he had issue Arthur Annesley, Lord Valentia, born March 21, 1843, and Mary Catherine, born March 21, 1844. Of the latter, four have been married—viz., the Hon. Frances, wife of William Lee, of Hartwell Hall, Buckinghamshire; the Hon. Matilda, widow of J. Hulme Holmes, Esq.; the Hon. Eva, wife of Henry Robinson, Esq.; and the Hon. Dora Lady Robinson, wife of Sir H. G. S. Robinson, Governor of Ceylon. Viscount Valentia died on the 29th ult., and is succeeded by his grandson, his Lordship's eldest son Arthur Annesley's son the only by the first wife, Catherine Lady Valentia—Colonel James Macdonald, of Clanronald—namely, Arthur, who was born on the 21st of March, 1843, and is now Viscount Valentia, Baron Mountnorris, and Premier Baronet of Ireland. The late Viscount Valentia, Baron Mountnorris, and Premier Baronet of Ireland, was a very well known Tory country gentleman, and was in his 79th year.

(the earldom became extinct) in the original Irish viscountcy of Valentia, conferred in 1622, and the barony of Mountnorris, conferred in 1628, on Sir Francis Annesley, Knt., Vice-Treasurer and Treasurer-at-War of Ireland, grandson of Sir Brian Annesley, of Dyrick, Esq., of Shatterlock Park, Northants, by whom, who died in June, 1631, he had issue by his wife Margaret, daughter of whom one son and all the daughters died without issue. Of the latter, four have been married—viz., the Hon. Frances, wife of William Lee, of Hartwell Hall, Buckinghamshire; the Hon. Matilda, widow of J. Hulme Holmes, Esq.; the Hon. Eva, wife of Henry Robinson, Esq.; and the Hon. Dora Lady Robinson, wife of Sir H. G. S. Robinson, Governor of Ceylon. Viscount Valentia died on the 29th ult., and is succeeded by his grandson, his Lordship's eldest son Arthur Annesley's son the only by the first wife, Catherine Lady Valentia—Colonel James Macdonald, of Clanronald—namely, Arthur, who was born on the 21st of March, 1843, and is now Viscount Valentia, Baron Mountnorris, and Premier Baronet of Ireland. The late Viscount Valentia, Baron Mountnorris, and Premier Baronet of Ireland, was a very well known Tory country gentleman, and was in his 79th year.

ADMIRAL AYSCOUGH.

John Ayscough, Admiral of the Red, the eldest Admiral in the Navy, whose name Admiral Ayscough commenced his career as a midshipman of the service," and whose death has just occurred, in his eighty-ninth year, at his residence, Hill-street, Berkeley-square, was the son of Captain John Ayscough, by that vessel on her passage home from North America. He was the grandson, on the side, and lost his leg from a wound. Admiral Ayscough was also Captain Ayscough, who was in command of the Guardian frigate, which was sent to a high northern latitude for the protection of the Greenland whale fishery, and was lost in 1782. He served in the Mediterranean, and had the charge of a fleet of merchantmen, by the masters of whom Captain Ayscough was presented with a piece of plate and a purse of gold, and thanked for his conduct in the execution of his trust. Admiral Ayscough was cruising off Italy, and was at the capture of Procida and Ischia. He was also present at the bombardment of Genoa, and was employed in the long line entrusted with the notice of Admiral G. Martin by his handsome support of the Spartan and Tartar in an attack on a French squadron in the Adriatic. Admiral Ayscough, with two frigates and several sloops under his orders, had assigned to him the duty of watching the movements of a squadron of the enemy's vessels of equal force with Murat, whose every attempt—although in command of 9,000 troops—to escape was frustrated by the vigilance of the British officer. Admiral Ayscough was the first to whom the boon was extended. He became an Admiral of the Blue on the 4th of June, 1814, Admiral of the White on the 22nd of July, 1830, and Admiral of the Red on the 23rd of November, 1841. Admiral Ayscough was not, as stated in the notice of the Baronet in last week's Number, educated at Christ Church, Oxford. As an "old Westminster," Sir Richard used to do everything in his power to keep up Westminster School friendships and associations.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Sir John Spencer Login, Knight, of Lanceston-place, Hyde Park, and of Cluny Castle, Aberdeenshire, who died on the 16th ult., under £40,000 per annum, chiefly in this country. Sir John had held high posts in connection with the East India Company, and in 1844 was Envoy to the Court of Persia. He married, in 1826, Jane, daughter of Sir Alexander Johnston, Chief Justice of the Bahamas Dunlop Sleigh. Sir John died in October last, and his widow, the sole executrix and trustee nominated by his relict (Lady Login), his cousin Mrs. Mackay, of Bath, and Mr. Alexander Mackay, of the Bengal Civil Service, who are in their minority. The whole of the property is left to Lady Login for the maintenance and education of her children, and is to be divided amongst them upon her decease.

The will of James Bunstone Bunning, Esq., F.S.A., of Gloucester Crescent, Regent's Park, and of Basinghall-street, who died on the 15th ult., by his relict, the sole executrix—the personalty sworn under £70,000. The testator was the son of the late architect of the City of London. His appointment he retained until his death, in November last. His will was executed on the 10th of May, 1861, and contained the whole of his property to his wife, for her own absolute use and benefit.

PRISON DISCIPLINE.—The annual report of Mr. Herbert Voules, Inspector of Prisons for the Northern District, has just been issued. It brings to the notice of the Government the difference between England and Scotland in the treatment of juvenile offenders. Whereas in England there are definite rules, which limit the authority of the visiting justices and the governor of a prison, in Scotland there is no such limit, and that the use of handcuffs and fetters is limited, as in England. The rules framed by the Secretary of State for Scotland, which are identical both with military parts of England, as well as Scotland. It is stated that handcuffs cannot be used except by the governor of the prisoner with one another, or to fasten the hands to the person, and the habitual detention of discharged prisoners still almost drives them to their old haunts and associates. A statement is made respecting Guildford Prison, which has been specially recommended by the governor to give employment (other than hard labour) to all prisoners sentenced by the Quarter Sessions Court, and that that may account for the small number of detainees in this gaol.

THE FARM.

MR. PLANT has proved himself quite a "Lord Clifden" among weather prophets; and we thought we had entirely lost him for the year, and as we rode over the Launcerston hills, with the frost cutting us like a knife to the bone. Descending into the low countries once more, we found the farmers all busy at the curling ponds, and the carts of strawberry and raspberry creams to come. So intent are the farmers on curling, that with their hypothetic discussions and corn average troubles seem to be quite merged in "the rink," and one can near the hum of the curling stones, and the clatter of the saddle horses, from down the river, that we could hardly secure a corner for our own to look. Although it was the first meeting of the season, being on New-Year's Day, the frost did not regularly set in here till the 3rd or 4th, and the bonnie old Tweed was "bare" for a week or two, and even weeks, in consequence of an injury to an old pet mare, which opened the joint, and let out a pint of oil an hour. They were stopped when they reached the plantations round Wark, on the road to the late Mr. Rea's, where he was lying dead at the time. The deceased was a very well known border character, who was born about 1800, a year, and a good man with hounds when in health.

A great general sale commenced at absolutely will at Stratford announces the sale of thirty of Mr. Fawkes's herd on the 16th of March, the day after the Shorthorn Sale. This sale, which with the Sarsden century on the 22nd, there will be nearly 200 "terribly high-priced" cattle sold within about a week. The million franc-and-a-prize heifer Castrinia is dead, and we hear of another rather heavy heifer-calf four months old. Several of the Duke's mares are said to have died since they went abroad. They were lately offered at any price, and even looked dearer than the bride since they were foaled, but the transfer from those parks, where they worked for their own living, to a different climate and different food seem to have ruled them.

The celebrated blood sire Birdcatcher's Cossack died suddenly, at Kirklinton Park, Cumberland, in which county he had been located for upwards of twenty years. He was foaled in 1840, and was never beaten but in his two-year-old season, when he carried off the champion stakes at Newmarket and at Doncaster. Cossack's dam was the mare, which he only won by a head and sheer gameness on the post, was the dam of Ellington, and (not) was seen at Doncaster, and it was no wonder that he found a purchaser after that for £300, and was the property of Mr. Bowes of the Derby. Poor, that point he went all wrong, and gradually settled down in Cumberland, where he became like a fixture, and commanded a fair nursing stock, with rather high forelegs. In fact, no horse ever did so much for so little attention and keep as he administered at least twenty-two to the heavier sole. Still, he the land, and was a favourite for beginning early as a general principle at first, and reserving every five years—a practice which keeps the land in better heart than giving a large quantity at once. He believed that what was called "over-liming" so often so much more powerful, and so much more concentrated, because so close to proper use if it was broken up and treated to lime and dung. Giving lime in manure, he did not think it, except it was composted well with dung. Overliming, in the real sense of the term, generally happened by the sensible, hard, and unbroken state of the soil. Although what trench-ploughing and dung. Mr. P. M'Pherson, of Cawsock, ever tried it with a very good success. Over a five-shilt rotation to give lime always when it was in green crop, and to top dress with lime (worked in by the harrows) at the rate of five or ten bolls an acre, when sowing out the grass seeds. Mr. Skrymsher, of Cawsglass, found lime to work best by spreading it on the ground before drilling the turnip seed in the drills. He had tried every other: it would kill the weeds and save a ploughing. He felt the benefit last so much that he would not be able to be lucky and the crop wards; and he also observed that no advantage was to be got from lime unless the manure was properly mixed.

At a preliminary meeting of the Highland Society, in Inverness, to arrange for the meeting at Dr. Geddes's motion—that prizes should be awarded to crossed beasts as breeders, but that should be limited to a second cross—was very properly rejected by a large majority. A letter from Mr. Lloyd Chervisi and Mr. Gibbs faced awes should be shown with lambs at their foot, and that a medal should be given for the best pair of lambs. It is necessary to judge the servants in the showyard will cause under the consideration of Directors. The Highland Society's Show will be held at Perth. Hall Maxwell than the temporary accommodation at Battersea; but the facilities for procuring beasts at Perth are, of course, much greater in the metropolis than they will be at Inverness.

It is calculated that Paris every day consumes 250 oxen, 200 calves, 300 pigs, and 1300 sheep—to say nothing of poultry and game; and that the Parisians eat every year 1,000,000 sheep to the value of £4,000,000.

The making of railways has become a large and important branch of industry in Belgium. Within the last few years more or many, it has a body of about 130,000 men regularly employed in working them. Then there is the large number of persons employed in building locomotives, carriages, and other, employed in providing the requisite materials for permanent way and rolling stock, amounting altogether to 30,000 in a period of, say, 200,000 persons. These, with their wives and families, represent a total of about 600,000 souls—or one-twentieth of a million, or about one fifty of the whole population of the kingdom, who are directly dependent upon railways for the existence.—Railway Journal.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

The History of Steam Navigation is yet to be written. New facts, or novel versions of old facts, are repeatedly turning up, so as to affect claims of priority. Last year three papers were read to the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society—1, "On the Introduction of Steam Navigation;" 2 and 3, "Notes on Fire Boats in the History." &c.; and there cropped up the following paragraph :—

A STEAM-BOAT IN 1786.—In a letter from Dr. Franklin to Dr. Ingenhausz, dated Philadelphia, Oct. 24, 1786, the Doctor remarks :—" We have no philosophical news here, except that Mr. Rittenhouse has made a steam-engine move itself against title in our river, and it is apprehended the construction may be so simplified and improved as to be of great use."

In going over the ground of the history, even practised writers are continually stumbling. The other day a reviewer, in the Times, referred to a statement, that "there are persons living" who "attempted to propel a boat by steam in the harbour of Barcelona." To this a Correspondent replied, but replied wrongly.

The evidence cited by the Spaniards for this assertion, often repeated, is a letter from Blasco Ramon Garay, in 1543.

By permission of the Queen of Spain, but after much hindrance, I was enabled to inspect this letter, and ascertained that it was addressed to Senor Valisolid, and there is not one word about steam in the document. Blasco describes simply a vessel propelled by paddles worked by the men.

The first well authenticated instance of a steam-boat actually used in the manner of modern steamers, by means of paddle-wheels, is in the Public Library at Hanover, where Papin relates his experiments with a boat driven by steam on the river Fulda, in 1707. Papin died in 1714, and Savery in 1715. Jonathan Hulls's steam-boat failed through the Argus, which, he re-named her the Thames, and navigated her all the way from the Clyde to the Thames by sea, calling at Dublin and Milford. This was the most wondrous feat of that day. Mr. Burton has also sent us a correct chronology of the Rise and Progress of British Steam Navigation from 1788 to 1821—after which its history is well known and authenticated. It will be seen that 1788 was the year in which Miller, Taylor, and Symington constructed their joint steam-vessel, which, also (if the above quoted paragraph be authentic), Dr. Franklin saw "a boat moved by a steam-engine" in the river at Philadelphia.

We have been favoured with the following, from Belgium :—

In Mr. Cohen's "Notes and Queries," of the LONDON LITERARY REVIEW, Nov. 7, 1863, it is said that "a correspondence of near half a century, in letters from Horace Walpole to Sir Horace Mann, Lampugnani, and his husband in the annals of the Post Office." I have in my possession the correspondence of my father's sister, the Elisabeth Lampugnani, Countess of Egelcken. In the most intimate friend, the Mrs. Duncombe, wife of the Rev. I. Duncombe, who received her father in his translation of Horace. Lampugnani, the unpublished letters of Elisabeth Corker, amounting to about 200, in my own handwriting, and dated from 1760 to 1790. Mrs. Corker, the Countess's mother, was a great friend of Mrs. Duncombe, and lived with her at Stanstead, Middlesex, Belgium, Dec. 31, 1863.

The statement of the intended amalgamation of the Southwark parishes of St. Saviour's, St. Olave's, and St. John, has been contradicted by "A Parish Officer of St. Olave's." The alarm for the safety of London Bridge is also groundless; the underpinning of Mr. Swithin's, who is evidently much interested in the preservation of the relic, states that he is not aware that the removal of the pile may be advisable. At Leicester, where is a Roman miliarium, like our Cannon-street wonder, more care is taken of the remains than in the second century, it being preserved in the museum of the Leicester Literary and Philosophical Society.

Our "curious" contemporary Notes and Queries, of whom we predicted success upon the appearance of the first number, just fourteen years since, has so far prospered as to enable the proprietors to venture to assume the type-writer—its own publishing office, and has commemorated the epoch by a New-Year's Number of unusual size and vigorous treatment. We congratulate our old friend upon his well-earned fortune.

A discovery of very considerable interest has been made, during the past autumn, in Normandy, near Bernay, on the line of the Great Riding of Yorkshire, in forming a new roadway at four or five feet from the present. During the excavations were found numerous fragments of old pottery, portions of querns, and a human jaw with three teeth, bones of the ox and sheep, deer and swine, and the skull of a porpoise. Also a large shells of the mussel and periwinkle, 14 ft. or 15 ft. in length, at from 17 ft. to 19 ft. below the present surface. It is stated :—

The bones, pottery, and querns were most abundantly met with in the part of the deposit now nearest the surface. Among the pottery were found very coarse, brown, ochre, clayey, knots, or broken branches of trees, charcoal, a specimen of very fine pottery with wood ingrain in it, numerous querns, hammers, bruisers, sickles, razors, a few seals of plants, besides wing-cases of beetles, and the bones of the ox, sheep, deer, and swine, and the skull of a porpoise. At a lower level, but above the shells, were found the bones of the ox, some inches in thickness, which, with all that lay below it (to a foot and a half or two feet), formed the shells, the skulls, and numerous bones of porpoises then deposited in water not liable to violent commotion.

From this deposit it is presumed that a sea must have been here a pool in ancient times, the bed of which originated in the geological movement which caused the land this visible to rise above the level of the ocean. There is no trace of these remains being evidences of lake dwellings. The account concludes the relics to be "undoubtedly Celtic, and beyond that to have a positive value to the."

The interest which attaches to "First and Last" induces us to record the death of a civic celebrity, "Alderman Harmer, of St. Charles." He was 74 years of age, and had been connected with the liberty of Farringdon Without for upwards of forty years, when displaced by the police, as private watchmen for Spital-square, the best evidence of his vigilance being that, during his watch, not no robbery is known to have occurred in the district. He had called up one person in the morning for fifteen years, without intermission for years. A century ago he would probably have been portrayed in a rude woodcut, as he is commemorated in a photograph, in his old broad-brimmed hat and great coat, and lantern in hand, standing in front of his box. The profits from the sale of some 150 of these photographs helped to soothe the old man in his last illness. Of the antiquity of watch and ward, a form of police which has existed from the earliest times, a sesquicentain may recollect a curious evidence in the watchmen who to the last kept watch on old London Bridge. They bore bullseyes to a comparatively late period, and their costume is stated to have been as old as the reign of Richard II. The old City watchman, of which there were 1600, was far more picturesque than his successor.

The New Part of the Journal of the British Archæological Association contains valuable papers on Unpublished Manuscripts relating to Mount Abbey ; on the Roman Roads, leading to and from Colchester ; and on Brixworth Church ; besides Proceedings and Antiquarian Intelligence of varied interest.

The Professor's scheme was to have a problem for every day in the year, and to have a certain number a certain amount of fifteen at the time rendering it impossible for the Problem to be published in such demanding so much and such intricate research. The papers by Professor B. Forster have been published in the Swedish Chess Magazine, and the Problems have been given, with considerable augmentation, in a work published by Messrs. W. H. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

THE NEW-YEAR'S GIFT TO ENGLAND.

On Friday evening last, a minute or two before nine o'clock, her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales gave birth to a son. The Princess had been present during the day with a party of ladies and gentlemen (many of the latter being members of the London Skating Club), who met the Prince and Princess for diversion on the ice at Virginia Water. Her Royal Highness, who is said to be an excellent skater, did not, of course, take part in that exercise, but was occasionally driven about in a sledge. She watched with much interest the game of hockey which was played upon the ice by the Prince of Wales and his companions, and did not leave for Frogmore Lodge until near four o'clock. The health of the Princess must, therefore, have been vigorous up to the hour of her confinement, and the successive bulletins which followed the first announcement of the auspicious event have been of a most satisfactory character as regards both the Royal mother and her babe. The news was conveyed within an hour of the accouchement to her Majesty at Osborne, who started betimes on Saturday morning for Windsor, at the station of which town she was met by the Prince of Wales, who accompanied her forthwith to Frogmore, where she also passed the afternoon of Sunday.

It were superfluous to remark that the announcement was received by the British public with the liveliest joy. Never was foreign Princess adopted into the great English family with more hearty or unreserved enthusiasm than the Princess Alexandra of Denmark; and, since the memorable day of her entry into London, she has not only preserved unimpaired, but, by the graciousness of her bearing, has, if possible, improved, her hold upon the loyal sympathies of all her Majesty's subjects. The movements of the Royal couple have been watched from that day to this with unabated interest, and no incident has occurred tending to chill in the slightest degree the warmth of popular affection. The birth of a son, and an heir to the throne in the second degree, is welcomed by the people of these realms with something of the pleasing excitement of a household event, and there were probably but few families within the four seas which engirdle these islands to whom the news did not impart a thrill of gladness—gladness for the sake of the Princess herself, of her husband, of the Queen, and of Old England, who now sees three generations of Sovereigns in a direct line, and who indulges in the hope that the Royal virtues as well as dignities will be hereditary.

The news is, assuredly, none the less acceptable in that it is the first break, since the beginning of the new year, in the monotonous succession of sinister forebodings which the last few days have thrust under our notice. The grandaire, on the mother's side, of the infant destined, in the natural course of things, to ascend the throne of an empire second to no other in the world, has but recently succeeded to a position of Royalty; and one of his uncles, who has hardly yet attained to manhood, has received the insignia of sovereignty over a little kingdom created but thirty years ago by European diplomacy, convulsed two or three times by revolution, and still disturbed throughout its narrow area by political factions. In neither instance has elevation to supreme rule brought increase of happiness, and time alone will show whether it may be recognised as a starting-point of distinguished and successful service. King Christian IX. of Denmark, exalted to his post by a treaty not yet twelve years old—the binding obligations of which upon one of the parties interested is denied—is already doomed to choose between having the better half of his kingdom wrenched from him or plunging into a war which will probably involve all the Powers of Europe. The German people, possessed by an idea over which they have brooded for years, and stimulated by petty Princes who appear to have looked upon a foreign and popular war as offering a more convenient chance for organising a united Germany than could be found in discussions which might possibly compromise their own anomalous position, exhibit the headstrong impetuosity of an ordinarily slow and docile but stubborn-tempered horse which has got the bit between his teeth and runs away with his rider. The Confederate Diet, unable even if it would, and possibly unwilling even if it could, to control the national will, having pushed its legal rights to an extreme in the military occupation of Holstein, which is indisputably a German duchy, and connived at a revolution effected under the protection of its own troops to set aside a succession settled in 1852 by the great Powers, Prussia and Austria included, is evidently intent upon invading Schleswig also, which is a Danish duchy, on the pretext that Schleswig and Holstein are inseparably united and must be ruled by one and the same authority. This invasion the King of Denmark will resist by force of arms, if necessary, and if Prussia does not support the Diet that, should it take place, Great Britain will be unable to refuse the claim of Denmark to assistance.

It is at such a moment of uncertainty as the infant Prince, in whose veins German and Danish blood is commingled, has been brought into the world. A quarrel of races over a dynastic arrangement which can hardly affect, either way, the substantial well-being of a hundred thousand people, is to occupy one half of Europe against the other, and to involve the effusion of rivers of blood and the expenditure of treasure to an amount beyond all calculation. Unhappily, moreover, antagonistic sympathies threaten to divide the two halves of the family; and the sister to whose affectionate tact the Prince of Wales is understood to have owed his bride is naturally German in her sympathies; whilst her brother and her brother's wife are not less naturally on the opposite side. It seems to us Englishmen a senseless feud, as it is unquestionably a sad one. We should hope that it will not disturb the personal relations of the members of our beloved Queen's family one to another; and we have long trusted that no personal considerations will bias the international policy of this country. But we cannot but regard as an additional cause of grief to the English nation, more than the last, the having before them the prospect of an unreasonable and unnecessary war, they may be destined to witness a conflict of interests, views, sympathies, and hopes in respect of that war, forced into the hitherto charmed circle of which the Queen's throne is the centre. The danger seems so imminent that we can entertain but faint hope of its being averted. From the beginning of the year every day has brought it nearer and nearer, every telegram has been more discouraging than the last. The birth of the Prince will not alter the position of affairs; but the event is hailed as the appearance of a bright star in the midst of a dark and stormy night.

We do but express the universal wish of our fellowcountrymen when we pray that the princely babe may be a harbinger of peace. Blessings, as well as trials, often come in clusters. In the manner in which the year of winter, by a happy coincidence, gave way at the birth of this child to the genial weather, the clouds which now overhang Europe, threatening it with the disasters and desolations of war, should show the meaning to the close of the year, and should pass away without laying waste the nations. January 8, 1864, will be a memorable day with this generation of Englishmen. Should the event, also, which seems more likely, chase from the heart of her people the gracious Queen the present shadows of her widowhood, and by attracting her thoughts and affections from the irrevocable past to the present, shed a mellow sunshine upon her bosom, and reconcile her once again to public life; her people will owe to the event an exuberant concurrence of pleasing circumstances, and, tracing in it a connection of cause and effect, will throw increased warmth into their congratulations and good wishes. Come what may, however, the year cannot have begun with a more auspicious omen. May he grow up to be the pride of the coming generation, as his father and his father's father have been of this! May he inherit all the virtues which have made their names, or enshalmed the memory, of those who preceded him! And may he be reserved to our children's children to do homage to him as a wise and beneficent Sovereign, swaying the sceptre over a peaceful, prosperous, and happy people!

Our late edition last week contained the account of the discovery of a plot against the Emperor's life, and the police have arrested four foreigners of suspicious appearance, coming from Italy. At their residence, in the rue Lafayette, were found 25 kilogrammes of four pounds, four revolvers, four six-guns of a new and ingenious construction, four swords, fifteen daggers, four Spanish stilettos in length, and eight hand-grenades, made on the Orsini pattern, for the terrible project of one of these men was found a letter dated from Lugano very compromising for those who had signed it, and written in pencil. Two of the men are Italians, named respectively Trabucco, Greco, and Imperato. The fourth is supposed to be attached to the police. Documents are said to have been found on the four conspiratory papers, and the police are now engaged in working out the plot. It is asserted that all the prisoners have made disclosures. The original statement that the conspirators purposed the Emperor to execute their diabolical project is false; but it is affirmed that the French police received from Switzerland the first intimation of the plot.

The Imperial Prince has become a "Quartermaster" of Spahis, a deputation of which corps waited upon the Emperor at St. Cloud, and presented him with three suits of the uniform of that grand Arab-like cavalry corps, which he immediately donned.

The debate on the Supplementary Grants still took place in the Corps Législatif on Friday and Saturday last. M. Berryer, now seventy-five years old, spoke for the first time in the house after an absence of twelve years from public life. He spoke strongly against the measure. The grants were carried by 241 votes to 31, only fourteen votes being given against it.

On Monday last M. Thiers spoke upon the address was begun. M. Thiers made a long speech. He said that France was ripe for liberty, and said:—"I want the chief of the State to cease to be one, that country would exact that which is now respectfully requested." Upon this remark M. The Moniteur de la Flotte states that a rifled steel cannon has been cast in one of the Government foundries at St. Gobain, and is another yet produced by Sir William Armstrong. It was tried at the Polygon of Gavres, near Lorient, with the ball proper to the 24-pounder. A target strongly planed as any frigate afloat at a distance of 1000 yards. Its superiority over the Sir William Armstrong gun is the precision in comparative lightness and in the facility with which it can be manœuvred.

Advices from Mexico report further progress in the occupation of the country by the French. President Juarez and his Ministers are stated to have abandoned Tuxtla, in the province of Chiapas. It was asserted that Spain and Holland had recognised the Imperial Government.

ITALY.

In the Senate the treaty of commerce and navigation with France has been unanimously adopted. Signor Scialoja, Minister of the Council, spoke strongly in favour of the treaty as a measure destined to draw closer the political and financial relations of France and Italy. The Minister took the opportunity to express the sentiment of indignation felt by the Italian people at the treacherous attempt against the Emperor. This allusion was received with loud applause. On Wednesday the treaty was adopted by the Chamber.

The Chamber of Deputies, after a debate of several days, has passed the bill for the suppression of lotteries by 150 to 81 votes. The Minister of the Interior, speaking upon the bill on Monday, bitterly repelled the present occurrence in Paris, which, he said, has aroused general indignation. The Ministerial words were received by the deputies with hearty applause.

From them it appears that Captain Sherard Osborn, before having anything to do with the matter, appointed Admiral Hope, and that he was to be subordinate to the Emperor of China alone, orders being received through Mr. H. N. Lay, C.B., specially by the Chinese as Inspector-General of Customs, who, moreover, was to have power to refuse to be the medium of any order of the Admiral which he might think fit to refuse. Shortly after arrival, however, Captain Osborn found that the Chinese, quietly organising all arrangements for the expedition, required him, as chief under the orders of any Chinese local official in whose district he might be. Captain Osborn immediately declared such an arrangement observing that he did not come to China to be the servant of petty officials of the Empire. The chief Maori complaint of Mermaure has been taken, but after the natives had decamped. The Maoris, relying on the nature of the ground in the rear of their fortified position, had retired from it without artificial defence, had neglected to fortify this point as carefully as they had done on all other sides. General Cameron, therefore, finding this to be unoccupied, quickly moved up a force during the night, landed his men above the stronghold, and by daylight next morning had established his position in the rear. The natives made an ineffectual attempt to dislodge the force and apparently aware that they could not now hold their position, retreated to the south of the Thames, leaving General Cameron master of the position and of a deserted pah.

One section, at least, of the Maoris seem disposed to be true to us, these, namely, in the Canterbury settlement. An address from them to the Queen has been sent home by Mr. H. May he keep you in joy and peace, and may your days equal those of the immortal Rehua; and may you see the Independent Maori children's children and of the whole Ioherah has committed to your care. This is all. From your loving children, the Maoris of Canterbury."

exist. At the adjourned meeting the secretaries were called to account for their conduct; their defence was not deemed satisfactory, and they proposed to withdraw the report. But it was considered that they were incompetent to do this, and, in a committee of nearly seventy, two divisions were taken; the first deciding that the committee would not proceed, as suggested, to any other business until the so-called report should have been dealt with, the second deciding that the report should be rejected. Its opponents then assented to a compromise which was proposed, and the entire body agreed to appoint a subcommittee, to confer with the present executive upon the preparation of such an address as should be worthy of the occasion. So the matter now stands; that is to say, the United Kingdom is waiting to be addressed by the national committee.

This is rather making much ado about what, but there is an indication of earnestness, and several of the speakers at the meetings showed themselves impressed with a due sense of the importance of the subject and of the absolute necessity of our not making ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the world. We can quite sympathise with those who, regarding the address from a high literary point of view, feel the exceeding difficulty of phrasing the appeal. It is not the right thing to write worthily about Shakspeare. But, if we might respectfully urge the suggestion upon the new body, it is of much more importance that the nation should be put at once, and in a practical manner, in possession of the scheme, than that it should be more elaborately by the same process delayed. When the united pens of an accomplished sub-committee are capable. The simpler the appeal the better, provided that it is to the purpose. Milton's noble sonnet to Shakspeare would not be adopted, with a few words to show that, if we depart from the implied counsel of Milton, it is not to increase the fame of Shakspeare, but to gratify our own feelings of love and veneration. On the site, the 23rd of April, and the day of raising the fund, the ceremonial of the day, are all matters of much more importance; and we trust that these, and a few other matters, will be the themes for discussion on the next. We must emphatically repeat that it seems to be felt that enough has been done in the way of the expression of certain personal feelings, the existence of which it would be absurd to deny; and we have reason to believe, or at least to hope, that the next step will be, with the general consent, been infused into the "direction," will flow in healthful and harmonious current with the old. Should it be otherwise, the entire scheme will, as it advanced partook, have to be abandoned, and those who are resolved upon a celebration of some kind will have to transfer their allegiance to the Stratford committee.

This latter committee, which has much to say for itself, and which, in the person of the Mayor of Stratford, has been treated with less than proper courtesy by a part of the London secretariat, appears to have been able to avoid dissension and to have made the arrangements for the approaching celebration. Still, it is far easier to organise a sort of Shakspearean musical festival, with "a ball for the ladies" (as the placards of the last century used to say), in a quiet little country town, than to arrange anything which, in the eyes of the Europeanic population like that of London. The directors of the Stratford affair have catered very well, and have relieved the dreadful monotony of local scheme—their procession, masquerade, and the like—by the promise of a performance of Handel's greatest work, whereby a certain elevation and seriousness are imparted to a festival which would otherwise have been very close too like the business got up by Manager Garrick, "with a view to the interests of his own theatre." We ought also to add that many dramatic and musical artists of high reputation have undertaken to give their labours; and, upon the whole, we are inclined to think that the best will be the fate of the national undertaking, the holidays at Stratford-upon-Avon will be exceedingly pleasant. We presume that arrangements have been made to prevent that "swindling of visitants" about which Mr. Boswell was so pathetic on the last occasion, and that the festival will not be regarded by the inhabitants as one of their perquisites, but that they will be hospitable and liberal.

Sincerely wishing all success to honest and disinterested efforts, let them be made by whom they may, to do honour to the greatest of Englishmen, we can but resume our attitude of waiting until further notice. But we must repeat "the motto on the dial," tempus fugit.

THE COURT.

The Queen received a telegram at 10 p.m., yesterday se'nnight, at Osborne, announcing the accouchement of the Princess of Wales. Her Majesty gave immediate orders for preparation to be made for proceeding to Frogmore House early the following morning.

On Saturday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena and Princess Beatrice and attended by Lady Churchill, Miss Phipps, Miss Bruce, Sir Charles Phipps, Colonel Sir T. M. Biddulph, and Dr. Hedgman, left Osborne at half-past nine, a.m., and crossed over to Gosport in the Royal yacht Fairy. A special train was in waiting under the charge of Mr. Gedson, traffic superintendent of the London and South-Western Railway. The time occupied by the train on the journey was exactly one hour and twenty minutes, including a minute past ten, arriving at Windsor at fifty-five minutes past twelve o'clock. At the station a large number of persons had assembled, and of the town were assembled. The Prince of Wales drove from Frogmore to receive the Queen. The arrival of the train by Her Majesty was greeted with the most enthusiastic cheering. The Prince embraced the Queen most affectionately. Her Majesty was received by the officials of the Great Western Railway and conducted to their carriage. The Queen and Royal party immediately drove to Frogmore House, the Princesses and suite proceeding to the castle. The Queen was much affected with the loyal reception she had met with from those around her. Her Majesty was in mourning, remained with the Princess of Wales until late in the evening, and afterwards left for the castle.

On Sunday the Queen and Princess Helena attended Divine service in the private chapel of the castle. The Rev. H. Ellison officiated. Her Majesty proceeded in the afternoon to Frogmore House.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, went to Frogmore House, and remained during the day. The Maharajah Dhuleep Singh visited her Majesty.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, drove out. In the afternoon her Majesty went to Frogmore House and remained until late in the evening. Prince Arthur, attended by Major Elphinstone, arrived at the castle from Greenwich Park, returning in the afternoon.

On Wednesday the Queen went to Frogmore House to take leave of the Prince and Princess of Wales. At a quarter past one o'clock her Majesty, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, Princess Helena, and Princess Beatrice, left the castle, attended by the Marquis of Ailesbury and the Great Western Railway, in a close carriage, en route for Osborne. The train was conducted by Mr. Gedson, Chief Traffic Manager. Her Majesty took an affectionate leave of the Prince, and, with the Royal party, entered the saloon-carriage of the South-Western Company. As the train left the station the Prince and Princess of Wales and the numerous spectators assembled upon the platform. Her Majesty appeared in excellent health and spirits. The Queen left Gosport pier escorted by Frogmore House. Mr. Kelly attended the Royal train to Basingstoke, where a fresh engine was attached. At this station Mr. Gedson was in charge by the South-Western officials to Gosport, arriving at half-past three o'clock. The Queen and Royal party immediately left on board the Royal yacht Fairy. Her Majesty's journey was conducted with strict privacy.

The Court is expected to return to Windsor Castle at the end of the month.

Professor Max Müller had the honour of delivering two lectures last week, at Cliveden, before her Majesty and the Royal family, on the science of language.

ACCOUCHEMENT OF THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Princess of Wales was happily delivered of a Prince at two minutes to twelve o'clock p.m. on Friday se'nnight, at Frogmore House. The Prince of Wales, Earl Granville, and the Countess of Macclesfield were present at the birth. The Archbishop of Canterbury attended upon the Princess, in the absence of the physicians appointed to attend her Royal Highness, considering it unnecessary and suspicious even being premature. The Princess is progressing most favourably, and the infant Prince is in perfect health. The inquiries at Frogmore House are continuous.

The joyful event of the birth of the Prince at this time was quite unexpected, and was consequently the Queen's Drawing-room not anticipated until March. It was intended that the confinement of her Royal Highness should take place at Sandringham House, and the Princess was to leave Frogmore for London in about a fortnight. For several days past the Princess has been suffering from influenza, suffering from catarrh and cold. Her Royal Highness, however, had intended leaving Frogmore for the Metropolis on her way to Virginia Water on Friday se'nnight. Upon returning to Frogmore, the Princess became extremely unwell, and the Queen sent a telegram to the Queen at Osborne announcing the condition of her Royal Highness, and a special train was dispatched for Dr. Brown, who arrived at seven o'clock, and at two minutes to twelve the Prince was safely delivered of a healthy Prince. Messages had been sent for the medical men appointed to attend her Royal Highness, including Sir George Grey; but the Prince was born long before they could reach Frogmore. Dr. Brown was the first to announce the birth. He was followed by Dr. Farre and Dr. Gream, and later by Sir Charles Locock. The Prince of Wales was present at the birth. As soon as being premature, there was no nurse in attendance, and no preparation had been made for the reception of the child. The Prince, a telegram was dispatched to the Queen immediately after the birth of the Prince. The Queen received the news in the presence of the Cabinet present at Frogmore at the birth of the Prince. His Majesty was young, but he having been invited to shoot on the following day with the Prince of Wales.

During Saturday last Frogmore was the scene of great excitement, each hour bringing fresh bulletins from the Queen, members of the household, and large numbers of the aristocracy, to offer their congratulations to the Prince.

The unexpected announcement of the birth of the Prince was received with joy by the people. It was communicated to the Mayor of Windsor by Lieutenant-General Knollys on Friday se'nnight, when the Mayor, Corporation, and officials of the Queen's were rung. On Saturday last the bells of St. George's Chapel and St. John's Church were rung, and on Sunday the forty-one guns were fired by the town boatmen from the mound in the Brocas, in honour of the event. The principal inhabitants were also adorned with flags and banners.

In London, the Lord Mayor received the announcement of the happy event from Sir George Grey, at the Mansion House. The bulletin was immediately posted in the front of the Mansion House. The Lieutenant of the Tower, in Hyde Park, and in the Tower; a salute was also fired from the Tower; and the bells of many of the City churches were rung. The announcement of the birth of the Queen's Privy Council assembled on this day, in the Council-chamber. Whitehall. The Lords of the Council and Sir George Grey, Her Princess' safe delivery of a Prince should be prepared by the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the use of churches and chapels throughout England, Wales, and Scotland, and in the town of Berwick-on-Tweed upon Sunday next, the 17th day of January, or the Sunday after the respective ministers shall receive the same.

On Sunday thanksgiving prayers were offered up for the Princess in the Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace, and in the churches and places of worship in Windsor and Eton.

A special Privy Council (Scotland) was convened by the Lord Mayor on Tuesday, at the Guildhall, for the adoption of addresses of congratulation to the Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales upon the auspicious occasion.

The telegram from Gravesend from the Foreign Ministers and the members of the aristocracy have been most numerous.

The Prince and Princess of Wales on Wednesday se'nnight, being Twelfth Day, entertained a juvenile party, about twenty in number, at Frogmore House.

On Thursday se'nnight the Prince, attended by his suite, went skating on the ice on the ornamental water in the Home Park. The officers of the Grenadier Guards and Royal Horse Guards, now quartered at Windsor, were provided with invitations to the skating party. The band of the Royal Horse Guards was in attendance. The Princess was present during a portion of the day. Their Royal Highness also entertained their visitors at lunch at Frogmore, and in the afternoon the skating was continued until a late hour.

Friday se'nnight the Prince left Sandringham for Wood Walton. The Prince, with his suite, left Frogmore House at a quarter past eleven o'clock, in a close carriage and four. The Prince, accompanied by the Countess of Macclesfield, followed in a close carriage. Their Royal Highnesses arrived at Wood Walton at half-past one and met on the ice by about forty ladies and gentlemen. Two sides were chosen for the game of hockey, which was the game that was distinguished by a white ribbon on the left arm. The game was kept up with great spirit, and was only suspended for a short interval, while their visitors, repaired to the Fishing Temple and partook of luncheon. Afterwards they returned to the lake and resumed the game of hockey, which was kept up until a quarter to five o'clock. The Prince is an excellent skater and player. The Princess, who is also an excellent skater, was present and joined in the game, and was occasionally driven about in a sledge. The Prince and Princess left Wood Walton at a quarter to five o'clock, attended by the Royal visitors and suite there were upwards of 500 persons present, including a large number of the tenantry, who assembled in the park, consisting of several difficult figures. The scene was enlivened by the performance of the band of the Royal Horse Guards, who were seated round a large charcoal fire on the banks of the lake.

PRINCE ALFRED.

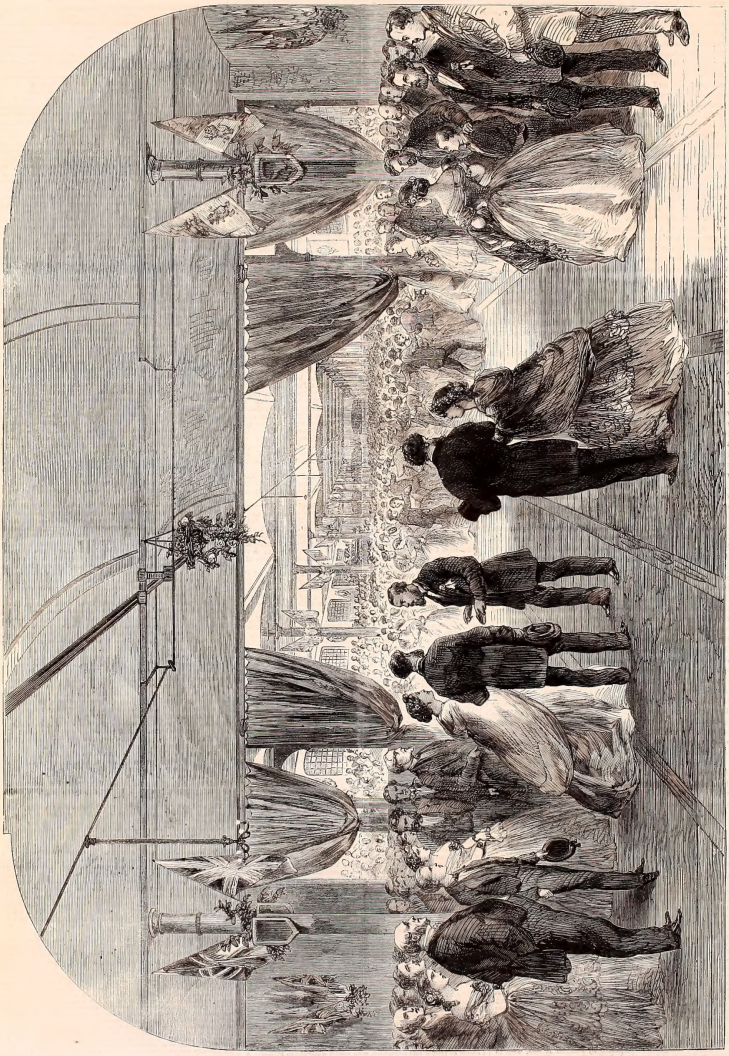
Prince Alfred continues at Holyrood Palace.

On Friday se'nnight his Royal Highness left Edinburgh on a visit to Lord and Lady Belhaven, at Wishaud House. The Prince travelled by the first p.m. train upon the Caledonian Railway to Wishaud station, where he arrived at seven o'clock. His Royal Highness was received by Lord and Lady Belhaven and a large number of people had assembled, who loudly cheered the Prince. A grand ball was given the same evening at Wishaud House in honour of his Royal Highness. The Prince returned to Holyrood on Monday.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

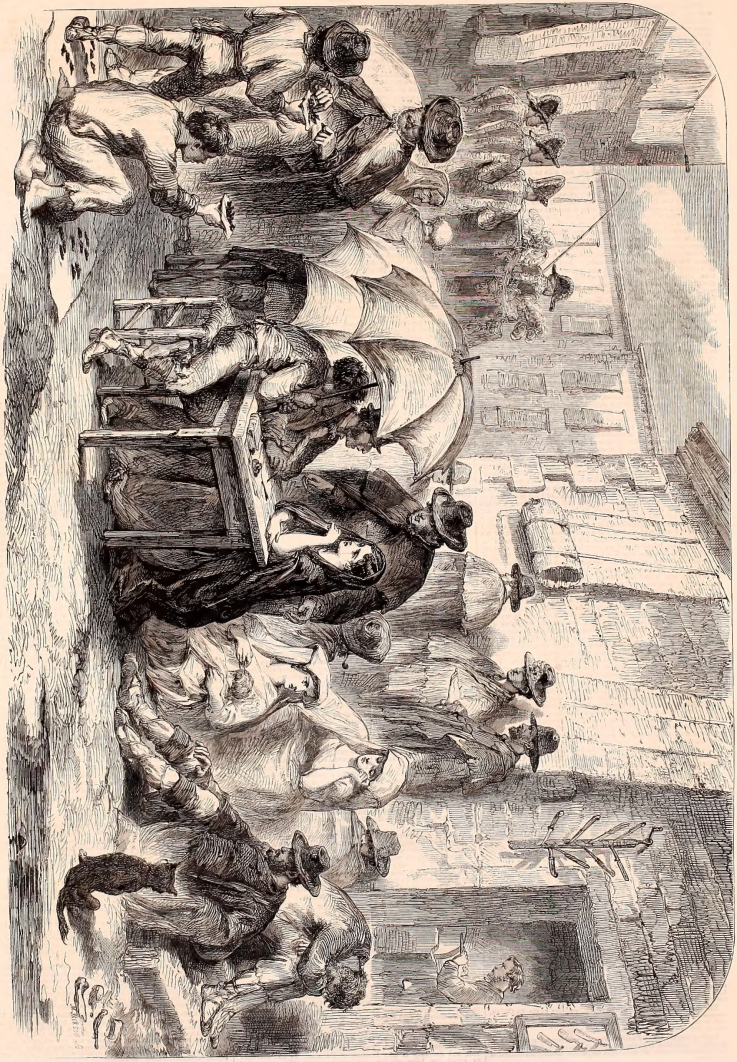
For a long time to come the British nation will be, collectively, just what all British people occasionally are, severally. The advent of the first child upsets everything. The mother, certainly, has no small attention paid her, and invariably takes front rank in each successive bulletin; but the father is always looked upon as a piece of furniture very much in the way, or may even be subjected to the same jealous glance with which the baby itself annihilated when he first robbed the old people of their darling. All English people are looking at the newly-born Prince of Wales as if a first child were in their own households. It is the subject, for a time, of all thoughts, conversation, and care. Kindred subjects naturally will suggest themselves; but ordinary politics, domestic events, even the Danish question, have, moving incidents by flood and field, painted lilies, despotic aggression abroad, and internal dissensions occasioned by political strife, all, from the largest to the least of everyday subjects, will scarcely find room in the newspapers, even in the very head lines usually consulted by the British Thunrer. The Duke of Wellington, is a made man, for it will now be possible for him to live to see his son in the midst of events, for who would be so careless as not to be fortunate enough to be "on the spot" when the baby cries? Lord Granville's appointment of Macclesfield exhibited a wealth of invention in "extemporising;" but Princess Louise's new baby will surpass even that. Happy, indeed, must be the Messrs. Caley, of Windsor, for the little Prince will be christened was at Marlborough House, and the kindly brothers had the honour of hitting him on the head there few weeks. Already has been raised the question of a name, and the answer has been "Edward;" but blessing that will be the future only knows what names not indigenous naturalised to English as well as to German ears. But yet one name is precisely as good as a dozen, and it is only as we said at the outset since fate o'er the waters blue that we become accustomed to long names which, from familiarity, cease to be so. Every head is not always a brilliant gem. In the meantime, corporations are busy looking up precedents, and the present generation has promptly set to its mind to the much as its grandfather did in the year '96. If a suggestion might be offered, it is that the Mayors and councilmen and aldermen of the various market-towns, who are entitled to a standard bottles, it would be that the precedent of presenting an address be not followed. Such a thing is only acceptable as a matter of course or local affection; but to read it is destructive of all vocation, and the attention is rarely commanded by a stranger. Moreover, it is hard to imagine that Royal Highnesses find considerable embarrassment in furnishing replies thereto.

Names are most suggestive things, despite Juliet, and often influence careers to a great extent. Who has ever been Wellington's namesake was save only fought at school; and Shelley Smiths, who have only happened to be born in the same year, have been known to be called Lucifer. But frequently the right name is in the right place. So see Edmunds have all risen to be at the post as Speaker subsequent to Burke. Many Stanhopes may, metaphorically, have ordered, and dying breath, the chair for their Mr. Dayvolles. Many rough Samuels may have adorned the market-place, pretended and ultimately although many a Julius or a Percival stands little chance of falling in the Senate. And so on with Scholefields and Cobdens, after all, more occasionally serving the place of blood, it behoveth Royalty especially to be careful in the choice of baptismal names, because it propels necessarily testifies to its loyalty by displaying that easy flattery—imitation. A name is a thing which sticks to a man through thick and though the hard. It may leave its mark on every "interesting event" in the social history of the time. Those descends of Charles Jamesses some sixty years of age, dating from the Fox time; and as many more of Williams, dating from the Pitt time, Williams mingling the dying glories of Pitt and the Admiral. Most of our Alberts have numbered twenty-four years; and, indeed, most peoples ages can be safely estimated from their name. In a certain measure, the little Prince may be at once considered as the godfather to many of his future subjects.



Mr. Gladstone's admirable speech to the working classes of a Flintshire town has occasioned a deal of scrambage of misconception. He boldly defended, to a certain extent, the public-house. He is the friend of the working man, and therefore would generally be attacked; although, indeed, his speeches have sometimes been adorned with elegances which have not been appreciated. Disraeli's novels were probably the result of a classical education which has been a part of his natural bent. It is needful to hint that it will be a task to recommend jabbering men to adopt too rigorously the Working Men's Club and Institute Union principles. The sociability, conviviality even, of a decorous alehouse must do much to cement man and wife's friendships, and consequently the goodness and heartiness of spirit in which their conduct is performed will be found to be somewhat banal that, and was quite right. It would little become me, he expressed himself, and my colleagues, to attempt in hardwearing days to stay the power classes the use of stimulants—of course, in moderation. In the form of Schiller's champagne and Burgundy, of course—lately declared to be necessary to the composition of their poems—Mr. Gladstone's remarks appear to commence with a moderate zeal, although he may be charged with addressing his audience from an Exchequer point of view. Let the people deal morally with the excise, and the obsequious excise played with him only too morally for the Chancellor's purse. Temperance from governing classes is before, because tending towards honourable and manly self-reliance, and edicts of pretext teachers who regulate ounce and dram.

Even Monkhouse's admirable picture, the National Picture Gallery is the subject, and a long-standing one, of warfare between the Executive and the House of Commons. The Executive may bring in the darkness, and the answer is simply a point towards London practice. Pictures, statues, busts, and still figures of nature is made to bear the lionet. At Munich, a student who wants to sketch a picture in the gallery has to get a note which says, more or less name in rotation with those of others, and bide his time. At the London National Gallery, on the week are admitted only students only. This plan entirely obviates such malpractices as are alleged to be the rule at Munich. Government has the power to compel access to a private room for a time, whilst in London he works in front of the picture as it hangs upon the wall, and the public enjoys the picture—on public days—and the student may be passed through the work.



There is every appearance of an attempt being made to follow up the thin end of the wedge already inserted by Government at South Kensington. Alterations have been issued by Her Majesty's Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings," desiring architects to furnish designs for the new Courts-houses on the Strand, "and elsewhere people hint that they are intended for the National History Collection and the Natural Museum. The intention seems, as to make the matter have all the appearance of being considered settled before the public knows of it. The second evening in January might materially tend to settle a long-vexed question. It may not be desirable, as the Government seems to think, to have the museums of art and science, libraries, &c., on the two spots, Trafalgar-square and Great Russell-street. The outlying provinces of the metropolis will need their museums as much as a share of each collection. But the people will look unfavourably upon Government acts which do "good by stealth." A man likes to be wronged according to law.

The Marquis of Bristol has recently presented to the National Portrait Gallery a portrait of Frederick, the second Earl of Bristol, Keeper of the Privy Seal to George II., and the subject of one of Pope's satires.

THE ROYAL ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—The annual meeting of the Archæological Institute, on Friday, the 8th inst., Mr. Pursall, the secretary, submitted for the members a report of the business which had been proposed for them by the engineer of the Great Eastern Railway, in order to show the necessity for the removal of the obstructions to the view of the ancient edifices. At the same meeting a communication from the Society of Antiquaries was received. That body expressed its entire concurrence in the course taken by the institute, and promised, by resolution, to offer strenuous opposition to the passage through Parliament of any bill that shall give power to the Great Eastern Railway Company to injure the Bastion grave-mounds. Several members of the institute having condemned the wanton and daringly-increasing disregard of ancient monuments by railway companies, it was unanimously resolved—"That the proposed method of carrying a line of railway through the Bastion grave-mounds at Bishopsgate Without would obtain the sanction of the institute the adoption of which would in any degree injure or destroy a single one of those mounds."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Savage Africa. By W. Winwood Reade. (1 vol. Smith, Elder, and Co.) Some time has elapsed since M. Du Chaillu and the gorilla were all the rage; since Mr. Mrs., and Miss Gorilla, with darars in their well-stuffed skins, glared out upon you from a window in the Strand; since morocco cases, professing to contain a portrait of Mr. Gorilla, were sold by thousands, in the print shops, and when opinion displayed nothing but a diminutive mirror which reflected the face of the purchaser; verge pens grew profusely in the country upon an equal occasion, and all but defied one another to mortal combat; and since the question was put to Parliament as to whether or not the gentleman's face was mistaken for a spitoon. President Buchanan and the gorilla were cast; President Lincoln and the gorilla were cast in. But the gorilla and the negro are closely connected, if not in family at any rate in country, and Mr. Reade's book contains remarks upon both. Now, if we recollect rightly, the author made his pilgrimage to "Savage Africa" expressly to see the gorilla in its native wilds, and he has not. Therefore, either disappointing to find how little he has to say upon that subject. It is true that he reaches the gorilla country, but he gets upon the wrong side of the river, and he quotes many authorities, that he sees persons who have not only heard but have been bitten by the brute, that he is aware of a gorilla dance, and that he takes all possible pains to learn what he can of the Great Invisible; but we are not able to discover that he ever in his own person saw a gorilla. In speaking of M. Du Chaillu, Mr. Reade says: "I am compelled to put much confidence in the statements of M. Du Chaillu, who has had better opportunities than any of us of learning the true nature of the animal, but who has, unhappily, been induced to sacrifice truth to effect, and the esteem of scientific men for a short-lived popularity." In fact, Mr. Reade's volume has been written a very entertaining book. "If I have any merit," he says "it is that of having been the first young man about town to make a fresh fuss over the African Negro. I have not attempted to write a salubrious country with no special object, and at his own expense. Le Jeune in the days of Louis XIII. went to Canada merely to let smoke his cigar amongst cannibals." And the tone of his book is exactly that which would be expected from a "young man about town" (if he happened to be very clever). The flirtations in particular, though very much in the "young man" style, are described with a warmth of colouring which is enough to horrify the prudish and startle those who are not used to such writing. Nor does the author abstain from anatomical questions of a delicate nature, which are more in place in a medical work than in a volume of travels. In fact, he writes upon everything, African, or Portuguese or other, from toothpicks to religion, with a self-complacency, a free-and-easiness, a dogmatism, a decidedness, a quickness of glance, and a readability which will please some immensely and displease others to the same extent. For our own part, we have found certain that we derived considerable amusement from his volume.

The Wife's Revenge. By W. W. Fenn. (3 vols. Hurst and Blackett.) This is a novel of more than ordinary merit, whether we look to the characters or the incidents. The plot is somewhat hackneyed, well described, and the latter are timed and arranged so as to create and sustain deep interest. Mr. Mervyn, the hero, is not a hero to the reader from flagging. It is not entirely devoid of fault (especially in the matter of delicacy), but it is, for the most part, well conceived and unstilted. Nor would it be fair to call the story sensational, or that term is generally understood; for we take it that a tale is emotionally powerful, not sensational, if it be developed by exciting evenly simply for the sake of gratifying the morbid or galvanising the blood. But when the author is not sensational, indeed, when he desires to impress vividly upon minds the awful consequences which may be the result of a single false step, or rather an existing evil, he is not only justified in exhibiting, he is almost bound to exhibit, in the most lurid colours that he can, the evil which must be connected with that evil. And the sentences which Mr. Wills has prefixed to his novel, and whose mean simply that the author is not to be shocked at the principle of English law which allows a wife's evidence, as it does her husband's, to be used in a court of law, forbids it in criminal cases. He therefore sets to work to show how a man whose character is cleared in a bankruptcy case by his wife's evidence, is condemned to the death on the evidence of his wife's evidence. And he performs his task with considerable ingenuity, power, humour, and pathos. It is not a pleasant story, nor is it a very healthy one, but it is far from being unnatural, and he very shrewdly points out that that cannot be the proper law by which husband and wife should refer their differences, behind mathematics in perfection; and a law which holds good for a class, and that the o-th, the most numerous, is not likely though not for the latter. Mr. Wills takes the o-th case, in which a father, to save his mother, takes upon himself the suspicion of a murder, is convicted of it, and dies (if not, alas! in reality, at least in baby son (only seven years old), and can be cleared only by the evidence of his wife, for the conviction of whom, as the mother and son, too, are indicted together; and we cannot see any reason why the wife should not have been called as a witness against her. It may be a reason, but we do not recollect that Mr. Wills has made it out clearly in his book. Moreover, there are two circumstances which it would take too long to particularise, but which tend to make the combination of circumstances extraordinary enough so as not likely to occur more than once, if so often, whilst "the great world" spins down the ages. Still, the circumstances of the story are not impossible to be framed with a view to experience and probability. Nor, indeed, does the author push his extreme case to the bitter end, the innocent after all, to suffer. We would not, for the sake of this great work, that we were fain at the end to exclaim emphatically, sebastur ergo Apollo oracula.

Life and Philanthropic Labours of Andrew Reed, D.D. Edited by his sons, Andrew Reed, M.A., and Charles Reed, F.S.A. (1 vol. Strahan and Co.) It has been said that but Dr. Reed's posthumous fame will bear out neither assertion. The evil, if he ever did, appears to be forgotten; and the good bids fair to last as long as masonry, and misfortune, and memory. For the misfortunes were his care, and the good deeds of others were the monument of his solicitude. A memoir and a portrait of the philanthropist have already appeared in Mr. Cassell's illustrated remains for us only to describe the nature of the book under consideration. The object of the writers has been to "set forth the man as he lived for himself," whenever it is possible; and the journals kept by Dr. Reed have rendered this possibility very great. The natural division of the life into the ministerial and philanthropic has been generally speaking, adhered to; and for this reason "Dr. Reed's miscellaneous labours have been grouped together, and not chronologically arranged. Lest it should puzzle anybody to conceive how a Dissenter became a Doctor of Divinity, it may be as well to state that the degree was conferred upon him in America, at Yale College. An extract from the memorial addressed in Wycliffe Chapel to the trustees terms a sufficient account of his life: it is in these words:—"As a man, he feels it would be blind to the facts to deny that some of the noblest institutions, for the relief of the fatherless, the idiot, and the incurably afflicted, have originated in his mind, and been carried out by an imperishable monument. He was born Nov. 27, 1787; and, having served his generation according to the will of God, he fell on sleep Feb. 25, 1862."

The Director of the Observatory at Bologna announces that on the 25th of December last he observed a comet between the constellation of Lyra and Hercules. It has the appearance of a nebula concentrated round a nucleus, with a tail not exceeding 30 minutes in length.

The telegraphic station at Ichenstadt, on the route to China, was opened on the 2nd of December, the distance from St. Petersburg being 2700 versts. It is believed that messages which formerly took twenty-three days by post will now reach that point in eight hours.

FINE ARTS.

In addition to the materials for preserving the resemblance of the personal lineaments of William Makepeace Thackeray alluded to in our last, and which would be available in erecting a monument to his memory, a posthumous cast of the great author's face was, we are informed, taken by Mr. Brucciani, of Newman Street, Henry Weekes, R.A. This mask, unlike almost every other we have seen, could correctly give a shock even to the most sensitive or to the most deeply bereaved. The expression has so much faithfulness in it that it seems actually trembling to a smile; there is no trace of pain, no shadow of suffering, and hence the original has been preserved from the ravages of death, which, though often seen in death, is almost invariably effaced by the decomposition of the plaster—this may be naturally generally reading only the osseous structure quite unaltered. We may remind our readers that, last autumn, a bust, executed by Mr. H. M. Weekes, R.A., of Mr. Thackeray in his study, already described, the deceased novelist's portrait was taken by Mr. Frederick Sandys. A cast from this bust has been engraved by Mr. Holl, the original being in Lord Ashburton's guildhall of Mr. Thackeray's residence, Kensington, and is a very admirable chalk drawing of Thackeray's head, nearly in profile, the eyes looking at a paper which he holds. This drawing has been photographed.

A committee of eminent artists has been formed to draw up a petition to Her Majesty praying that Queen's advocates may include the whole subject of London streets and communications, with a view to sanitary, engineering, and general improvements. The step has been taken by the advice of Professor Donaldson, who has been engaged on the new street architecture.

In anticipation of the changes in the schools, as well as other parts of the constitution of our Royal Academy which will probably be proposed before Parliament as a sequel to the Royal Commission of last year, a large particular respecting the only complete School of Fine Arts in Paris may be acceptable. A Council for Instruction, consisting of the Director and twelve Members of the Arts has then, been constituted as follows:—The Duc de Morny, honorary president; 2, Comte de Nieuwerkerke, Superintendent of Fine Arts, president; 3, Count Walewski, Minister of State; 4, Count de Parts, vice-president, and nominated for five years Director of the Academy of Fine Arts; 5, Count Laborde, Member of Institute; two architects, an engraver, two "senators," a general officer, and Baron Taylor, Director of the Theatre Français, and nominated by all of the staff of professors of the school. His salary is £120 per annum. The professors are to be paid £80 per annum, and £40 or £56 are to have studios provided for their use. In the school are taught painting, sculpture, engraving, and engraving on medals and precious stones. From one to three studios, with professors to each, are appropriated to the various branches. The following courses are given:—1, History of Art and Æsthetics; 2, Anatomy; 3, Perspective; 4, Elementary Architecture; 5, Descriptive Geometry; 6, Geology, Elementary Physics, and Chemistry; 7, Archæological Drawing; 8, Practical Application to Workyards; 8, History and Archæology. It will be seen that the subjects are more numerous than are taught in our schools. The obligations are—that all the pupils attend the course of history, and obligations are—that all the pupils attend the course of history, and that they attend the course of perspective. The drawing, painting, sculpture, and engraving, attend the courses of anatomy and perspective. The pupils are to be admitted to competitive trials at the courses except anatomy. All French artists, from the age of fifteen to thirty, are admissible to the school. The number of competitors for the great Rome prizes (one prize only to each section) after having succeeded in two preliminary tests. The winners of the Grand Prix de Rome will only receive pensions for four years; the first two of these they must spend at home, and the remaining two at Rome. Besides the Grand Prix de Rome, there are two extraordinary journeys upon informing the administration of their intentions.

An elaborate report has been presented to the Imperial Exhibition to every conformation of the great rock, and the ruins of the monastery of Saint-Bruno, founded by the founder of the order in the Crystal Palace. The model is built to a scale of 1 to 100, and is the work of a Chartreux, Mrs. Arnaud, who has been engaged upon its execution upwards of three years.

MUSIC.

The English Opera Association (Limited) has at length passed its proposition, and the scheme as detailed therein seems to promise very successful results. The Earl of Dunraven has taken on a large and liberal scale, the directors, who, headed by the Earl of Westmoreland, include Mr. Alfred Mellon, Mr. Frederick Gye, and other gentlemen equally determined to realise the long-desired establishment of a truly National opera. When the society was first formed, some time back, the greatest difficulty it had to contend with was the want of a suitable house, and it is probably owing to that obstacle that active operations have been so long delayed. Negotiations have, however, successfully been made with Mr. Gye, by which the directors of the company will become the lessees of Covent-garden Theatre during the autumn and winter months for a term of years commencing at Michaelmas next. Great stress is laid on the fact of there being no professional element in the management, so that the directors, it is hoped, will be the more well determined to take advantage of the highest professional talent, and will hold themselves responsible to the public alone, and will not delegate to any professor or artist such irresponsible power as could by possibility interfere with the interests of the general body. It is not the intention of the association to confine its performances to works of native composers alone, but the masterpieces of foreign operas of merit will also be given, amongst which we are promised "many gems" from the German school, and the production of one great Italian stage, and therefore, almost entirely unknown to the English public." Its intention is to study as much as possible strictly ensemble, and we may also understand that the best available talent will be forthcoming. Mr. Alfred Mellon has been retained as musical conductor, and Mr. Gye as the stage manager, in that of the Royal Italian Opera. The management of the stage will be left to Mr. Augustus Harris, who, by his experience, is well fitted for the scenery. Both in an artistic and in a commercial point of view the English Opera Association promises well, and, should the directors succeed in carrying out their intentions, they will well deserve, and we trust, obtain, the co-operation and support of the public.

After a triumphantly-successful engagement in Madrid (which had been preceded by one in Paris, in the Rue Rumainville,) and his again created a furore. The theatre was crowded on the evening of the first appearance of the "Favorita" in the presence of the Emperor and Empress; and she received the most flattering demonstrations of applause during the performance. Unwilling as they are, generally, to indorse reputations earned elsewhere, and more especially in London, the Spaniards have been quite unable to resist the fascinations and talents of the youthful artiste.

There has been absolutely nothing new, musically speaking, produced in London, during the week of "Parepa's" has been confirmed at the ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA by a series of crowded audiences, who have testified their delight by hearty applause and the admirable acting and singing of the performers. We are sincerely glad to see the continued prosperity of this house, and the Fyne and Harrison management towards the close of its career at Covent Garden.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.—On Saturday was produced a new play, by Mr. Edmund Falconer, entitled "Night and Morn." Though similar in title to Sir Lytton Bulwer's novel of "Night and Morning," there is no similarity between the subjects. The new piece is in three acts and constructed with well-practised skill. It opens with a long soliloquy in person by Julian di Vivaldi (Mr. Phelps), who has been incarcerated for twenty years as a political prisoner, and has consequently married a Princess. The union was annulled by a Papal Bull, and she is now the mistress of Farnese. The Princess (Miss Heath) we have alluded, and which serves the purpose of a prologue to a Greek play, Julian details the progress of which he has been making for escape, and soon after passes them in operation. We see him making his exit from the window, next hanging by the prison walls, and then sub on the terra firma, prepared to run away. Here he is met by a mysterious personage, who insists on his keeping an assignation with a lady who expects him, and leads him to a palace, where he has an interview with the confidante (Mrs. Murray) of the Princess Maria (Miss Heath). By the former he is soon put in the way of exchanging his prison dress for that of a page cavalier; but before he can see the Princess we find the lady having an interview with the Duchess of Ferrara. Alarmed, however, by the news that it is of course that the daughter had been following in the footsteps of her father, and returning to effect a rescue by marriage with a certain Leonardo, and who had been imprisoned for the act. At this point the mysterious personage, who has been now waiting, and great is her disappointment when she meets with Julian instead. In her disappointment she begins to be tender to the prisoner, but, being assured by a confidential Friar (Mr. Ryder) that Julian is guiltless of the crime for which he has been condemned, and is rescued by Julian's undertaking to secure the safety of Leonardo and to procure his pardon for their espousals. In the third act he has an interview with the Duchess, who informs her for the first time that he has been incarcerated in the fortress that stands within sight of her palace window, and who thought that he had been employed at Naples, employing life and liberty with a wife and children. She is really affected by the latter intelligence, but has a regard for her own safety induces her to put him under temporary arrest. To counteract this, however, she has that documents are safely deposited which will reveal all to the Duke within twelve hours unless he is released. She, however, soon discovers that Julian has also found, and has received a casket from a Friar, not to be opened until the lapse of the appointed time, and is very anxious to obtain possession of it; but the Duke, from a high sense of honour, resists her solicitations. Then follows a scene between the Princess and Julian, in which the latter solicits his consent for the marriage of the Princess with the imprisoned Leonardo. To the Duke's hesitating, he assumes a higher tone, and insists on having his request granted. He appeals to the casket in the Duke's possession, and to the proof that he himself is the true heir to the dukedom, and therefore entitled to the command; whereupon the Duke expresses his determination to resign in favour of Julian. The Duke, Mr. Ryder, finds that the latter

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE new year (which finds John Day with nearly 100 horses in training at Danebury) has brought the January entries well up to the mark. If the Newmarket Handicap has not been so successful as usual, the Prince of Wales Plate (handicap) comes to the rescue on the 21st Spring with 110 entries, and the Two-Year-Old Plate with 70, one of them the Duke of Beaufort's Sally-go-Lastly. The entries for the Lincoln Spring are capital throughout. The November Spring comes up well with its steeplechase: and the Liverpool Grand National, which is under the new rules, is no less than 87 entries. Among them we have two previous winners, Jealousy and Emblem (who is rated in the handicap more than fifty pounds in front of Jealousy), and Emblem (who is rated in the handicap more than fifty pounds in front of Jealousy), and she has a skin on, or she wouldn't make a shadow in the sun"). Umpire, Macaulay, Bellingrove, Dundee, Lord Clifden, Jealousy, Gwyn, and Avalanche are also among the lot, whose weights are "to be published in due time." The Two-Year-Old Stakes, which last year has a fine entry of 40; and the Two-Year-Old Stakes, which has taken a rare start in consequence of the extra £100 added to it, has reached 71, or three more than the Ascot Derby. There are also the Ham and the Findon Stakes at Goodwood. The Great Spring handicaps are headed as usual by the Chester Cup, the Great Northampton City and Suburban (148), the Great Northamptonshire (97), and the Great Metropolitan (67). And Clifden at Chester, the Northampton Cup, and Asteroid in the Great Northamptonshire and Great Metropolitan. Both these celebrities are among the 31 and 32 top weights, along with Union Jack, Queen Bertha, Harvest Moll, and Jack of Hearts; and Rataplan, who finishes one of Mr. Naylor's four second nominations.

Mr. Pinkey Smith has lost his celebrated old chestnut horse Father of the Turf, who had been before the public for upwards of twenty seasons, and had, we believe, beaten Lanercost and Melbourne in one of his many victorious struggles in the shires. The Knowsley experiment as to how long Miss Bove would live, has terminated rather prematurely, as the old mare, which has never been in a foal since 1857, when she finished an illustrious but sadly "roaring" line with Dee Bowlas, died in her loftier quarters. Mr. Edmund Hobson Jeaks were Iris, the winner of the Oaks; Longbow, one of the fastest and finest racers of her time; and Clifton, one of the best steeplechasers, whom Josh Scott believed to be a certainty for the St. Leger if his leg had not given way in the race; and Lady Alice, who was mainly backed for the Derby, by virtue of his two-year-old running, and has proved a great mare. The winnings of six of their stock alone exceed £20,000. She was by Catton from Tranby's dam by Orvill, and once created quite a sensation at Manchester, by beating General Chassé over a five-mile course. We had not seen her for two years, and she showed very slight symptoms of age to the last, when she was found dead in her box. The Field states that a post mortem has been put to the stud, and that one of Newminster's greatest patrons has applied for twenty subscription to mare-coming.

The new Tattersall's, at Knightsbridge, is progressing very fast. It stands upon nearly two acres, and has a frontage to Grafton, which is 60 ft. by 30 ft., and lighted by three domes, is attached to an area, answering to the present Mart, of 70 ft. by 60 ft. The Subscription Room is 100 ft. by 60 ft., and covered in by a roof of glass, supported by iron girders. The twenty loose boxes are 11 ft. by 9 ft., and lighted by a patent louvre top; and the rest of the accommodation for horses will comprise ninety-eight stalls. The manure pits will be arched over and the effluvia carried away by shafts, as well as the well, in fact, form a very perfect model of a building, in which the well-known bust of George IV. and the fox will have their places as of old in the ancient centre temple, as of yore. The carriages will not be on the ground-floor, as at present, but in a gallery overlooking the area at the lunge square of stables.

Those who mourn for her beautiful seat, nerve, and hands, both in Rotten-row and with the Quorn's hounds, will be grieved to hear of the death of the celebrated Miss Elizabeth Hall, which took place after a very severe accident in the park. But, although she gradually recovered from its effects, she was never herself again. Miss Hall was among the very best of Mr. Rarey's pupils; and her portrait, representing her on the side of a horse which she had just "put down," was the subject of a picture by Mr. Frank Stone at the Royal Academy in the Royal Academy some four or five years ago. Except, perhaps, on very rough ground, Miss Hall, in the full vigour of her nerve, Mr. Davis thought he had seen no lady rider equal to her.

The Accrington Steeplechase Society closed its members at their last meeting. There was a good report of the Alnanthas silkworm, which had been brought over to Accrington by Mr. Ashworth, and that the hen Wonga had laid an egg. Unfortunately she had dropped it from a perch and it was not known if the breeders

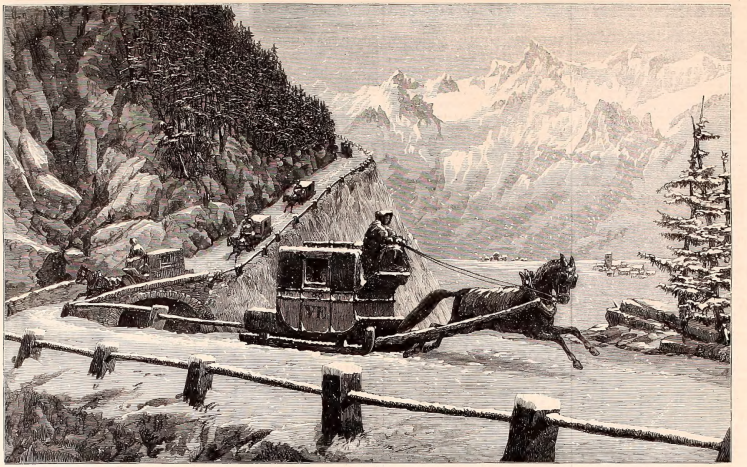
NEW-YEAR'S EVE AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LIVERPOOL.

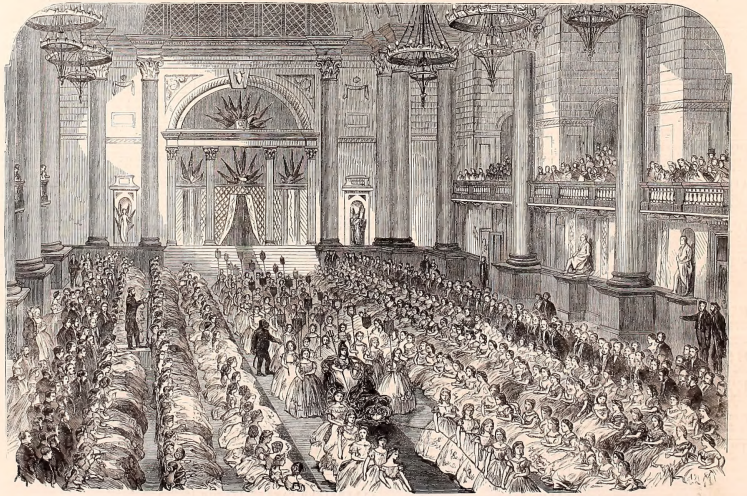


To persons well acquainted with Liverpool, the cigar manufactory of Messrs. Cope, Brothers, and Co., represents one of its most prominent industrial establishments. It is an example of what may be done by an honest endeavour to carry into practice some of those social arrangements between employers and their workpeople which result in their mutual advantage and their mutual good feeling. The entertainment to which the firm annually invite all the men, women, boys, and girls in their employ, and which is known as "Cope's Christmas Dance," has come to be regarded as an important if not a public event. As the business of the firm has increased, however, the number of workpeople has become so great that they have lately been straitened for room to hold their festival, and it was found necessary on the present New-Year's Eve to engage the largest building in Liverpool, St. George's Hall, in order effectually to keep up the annual revel.

About eight o'clock the gentlemen who had been specially invited began to arrive. Amongst those were the Mayor of Liverpool, Mr. J. Bramley-Moore, M.P., Rear-Admiral Evans, Mr. Alderman Woodruff, Messrs. F. B. Morley, H. Tate, J. B. Mellader, J. Rogers, W. B. Bairstow, James Baines, W. R. Copeland, and A. Henderson.

The real company of the evening, consisting of the workpeople of the factory, were astonished at the size of the hall and at the brilliant preparations made for their reception. Soon, however, they had assembled in happy, lively, laughing groups, and the admirable orchestra commenced the strains for a quadrill, which was but preliminary to a selection of dance' music, much of it composed for the occasion, and all heartily responded to, several dances being executed with admirable spirit.

The meeting, having been addressed by Mr. J. C. Cowper, joined in three cheers for the Mayor and his Worship, who was watching the scene from the gallery beneath the organ, responded by a few sensible and friendly words.



Soon after this, preparations were made for the great ceremony of the evening—the farewell to the Old and the welcome to the New Year. This pageant, which was in some sort a repetition of those gorgeous masques once so popular at Whitehall and other Royal palaces, was beautifully contrived, and gave unbounded satisfaction. Down the entire length of the hall, from the orchestra to the south court, broad strips of crimson carpet were spread, leaving an avenue of about 30 ft. wide. Upon these lines of carpets were ranged, sitting or reclining, the younger members of the assembly, while the elder sat or stood behind them in a picturesque combination of colours, the effect of their gay and varied dresses. At the end of the avenue, up the broad flight of steps leading to the south court, stood rows of young girls adorned with wreaths and bearing festoons of flowers; while behind these, again, were quaintly-costumed male figures carrying banners. The gateway of the court was filled with a richly-ornamented tent. At a few minutes to twelve o'clock the lights in the hall grew dim, and there suddenly arose in the centre of the avenue a representation of the Old Year, a figure like Time, with flowing hair and beard, and bearing a scythe. As he feebly walked onward towards the dais, DESCENDING MONT CENIS IN WINTER.—SEE PAGE 66.

Mr. J. C. Cowper, the tragedian, recited, with great taste and feeling, Tennyson's ode, "The Death of the Old Year." This was succeeded by slow organ music, amidst which "the Old Year" reached the dais, where he stood and paced round for a minute. As a deep-toned gong struck twelve, he turned and, lifting the curtains of the tent, retired as he disclosed the "New Year," a bright little creature, in a costume resembling that of Britannia. At this moment the light once more sprung up in the hall, the whole audience sang "Rule Britannia" and the National Anthem, while the fairy New Year entered a triumphal car, and was drawn across the hall, followed by the other figures in the pageant, as shown in our Engraving below. Then came a peal of bells, to which Mr. Cowper recited, with admirable effect, a poem written for the occasion.

Again the hall was cleared for dancing; and the next episode was a gigantic Christmas tree, hung with a great number of useful and ornamental as well as with the most grotesque prizes, including even an alligator and a gorilla (which latter fell to the Clown and chased him round the hall), dispensed by means of a wheel of fortune in which resided an attendant sprite. The "ebony minstrels" and some grotesque characters amongst the "professional" part of the audience contributed greatly to the amusements, and nothing flagged for an instant. The refreshments, even for such a large company, were ample, and admirably dispensed, and the dawn found some indefatigable dancers full of brisk appreciation of an entertainment which was successful, not only for the pleasure it afforded the guests, but as an expression of genuine and hearty interest between employers and workpeople.

OPENING OF THE CAPE TOWN AND WELLINGTON RAILWAY: ARRIVAL OF THE FIRST TRAIN AT WELLINGTON STATION.

AFTER many delays the Cape Town and Wellington Railway has been completed and opened. This is the only considerable railway undertaking begun in South Africa, and the first that has been finished in Cape Colony. The line, which is single, and about fifty-eight miles in length, including the extension into the city at Cape Town, crosses the Cape Flats, and ascends the Eerste River valley, passing through Stellenbosch and the Paarl, and terminates at the town of Wellington, situated at the foot of Bain's Kloof Pass, on the high road to the interior. In addition to the terminus stations, six intermediate ones have been provided—namely, at Salt River, D'Urban Road or Belle Ville, Eerste River, Stellenbosch, Klapmuts or Bennet's Ville, and the Paarl.

The railway was opened on the 4th of November last by Sir Philip Wodehouse, Governor of Cape Colony. We gather from the Cape papers some particulars of the ceremony. The train appointed to convey the Governor and the invited guests was appointed to leave Cape Town at 9.30 a.m., and an excursion-train, in which the public were accommodated, was fixed to leave a quarter of an hour later.

The invited guests assembled on the Strand-street side of the Cape Town terminal station; the general public on the opposite or Parade side. The station was gaily decorated with flags, garlands, and festoons of foliage and flowers, the steps leading to the platform on the Strand-street side being covered with crimson cloth. The guests' train consisted of about half a score of "composite" first and second class carriages, resplendent in new paint and varnish, the Governor's state coach, in the centre, being most tastefully decorated with flowers. The guests, numerous as they were, were all conducted to their seats by the officers of the company appointed to perform that duty, and not the slightest crowding or difficulty of any kind was experienced. Meanwhile, the opposite platform became densely packed by a crowd of excursionists waiting for the train appointed to convey them to the scene of attraction. At a few minutes before ten o'clock the "Governor's train" rolled slowly out of the station. Speeding rapidly onwards, the train arrived at Salt River station, where the Governor and Lady Wodehouse, a party of invited guests, a large number of excursionists, and a crowd of eight hundred persons, were awaiting its arrival. The Governor and his Lady and the "capital" hurtle having been duly received, the train moved under way. Speeding past D'Urban-road, Eeaste River, and Kuil's River stations, all decked with triumphal arches, garlands, and festoons of flowers, and crowded with interested spectators, the train wound its sinuous way into the deep recesses of the Eeste River Valley, where the most wonderful display of natural beauty is beheld—bosch, out "Sleepy Hollow," find a luxurious resting-place. At the Bellenbosch station the train halted for the first time. Here we were thronged with passengers awaiting the excursion-train, and a few of the invited, who, of course, obtained places in the "Governor's" train. Beyond Stellenbosch the line passes through one of the most beautiful, most highly-cultivated, and most productive districts of the Colony. Passing the famous "place" of the "Old Rass" and the well-known "model farm" of Mr. Robert Hart, the Governor's train launched into busy—but at a slackened speed, for the gradient is heavy—for the Paarl, where a short halt again ground. Now commenced the ascent of the same rich, fertile character, the train passed a little on the right of the six-mile avenue, flanked by villas, cottages, and farmhouses in the midst of vineyards, which leads to the pretty little village of the Paarl, and then dashed along the banks of the Berg River towards Wellington. Leaving the village of the Paarl on the right, they shortly arrived at the terminus, which is about a mile from the village—having been in motion two hours. The procession in the direction of Worcester. On the arrival of the train the volunteers, under the command of Colonel Bird, presented arms, the band played "God Save the Queen," the cannon of the artillery thundered a Royal salute, and the immense crowd, that here, as elsewhere, had collected to see what might be seen, cheered until they were hoarse. And amidst the cheering his Excellency the Governor and party launched into carriage and formally declared the line to be open.

The numerous guests found ample accommodation in the goods shed, tastefully decorated, where on the arrival of the train was prepared Tiffin and the complimentary speeches usual on these occasions over, the company at the conveyed back to the Cape Town station, the day twelve hundred persons travelled over the line without the slightest accident.

CHRISTMAS ENTERTAINMENT AT THE GREENWICH UNION.

THROUGH the liberality of Mrs. Angerstein, wife of the member for Greenwich, the inmates of the Union-house in that town were, on the 5th inst., brought together in the great hall of the establishment the beginning of the new year. Application had been made on behalf of Mrs. Angerstein for the permission that she might be permitted to afford the treat—namely, a number of Christmas trees, with the usual ornaments and useful articles, which were to be distributed among the inmates of the house. This permission was readily accorded; and on Tuesday week last—now never before remembered in the annals of the Union-house was the result. Between 900 and 1000 of the inmates men, women, and children—not excluding the imbecile and insane—were in the hall during the day. The hall was tastefully decorated with flags, lent for the occasion by Captain Lane, of Greenwich, whilst at the upper end of it, in front of the orchestra, was raised on a stand, were eight magnificent Christmas trees, the tops of which reached to the ceiling. Above the trees was the whole being laden with prizes—toys for the children, and small bags of snuff, tobacco, and tea for the old people. At the foot of the trees on their illuminated branches three thousand of there New-Year's gifts. There was a large attendance of visitors and friends of the board of guardians. Mr. and Mrs. Angerstein, with their family, were early in attendance, the entertainment not having taken place immediately after the inmates had partaken of their fish, half-pint of cider, at which time, accompanied by the master and matron, Mr. and Mrs. Kilby, they were entertained with useful articles of warmth, the distribution fairly commenced. Mrs. Angerstein, Mrs. Lane, and the ladies present themselves for a considerable period in this duty, the recipients of the prizes, who were distinguishable either by age or infirmity, as they came forward, having some kind words addressed to them and hope expressed for their future happiness. Cheer after cheer, and hearty cheers were given for Mrs. Angerstein. To add to the pleasure of the evening the band belonging to the 3rd Kent (Blackheath) Rifle Volunteers Corps, by permission of Captain Backer, gave their services, and during the proceedings played some very excellent pieces.

DEMONSTRATIONS BY THE PEOPLE OF HOLSTEIN

IN FAVOUR OF THE DUKE OF AUGUSTENBURG.

WE resume our Illustrations of the hearty welcome given by the Holsteiners to their Prince Frederick of Augustenburg. The intelligence of events in connection with the Schleswig-Holstein difficulty will be given in another column. Here we confine ourselves to a few particulars relating to our Engravings.

GREAT OPEN-AIR MEETING AT ELMSHORN.

Elmshorn, one of the first places in Holstein where Prince Frederick was proclaimed, is a flourishing town with considerable manufactures and commerce. It is particularly rapid in its growth, and there are not with in shadowing at all the fairs throughout the duchies. Elmshorn is one of the few towns in the whole duchies which can afford to entertain without previous special permission, and there is, consequently, a great market-place. Several surrounding communes assembled on the great open-air meeting which was held at Elmshorn. All agree in stating that it was a scene of the greatest enthusiasm. One of them estimates that there were 20,000 Holsteiners present—very likely one of the male population. It seems, however, to have been a clumsily-managed affair, according to the Holstein correspondent, by the way down in the carriages the passengers sang the everlasting national song of Schleswig-Holstein, and which they sang over and over two in Hamburg, grow as tired as they do of the "Dark Girl Dressa'd in Blue" in London. And when I arrived at the place of meeting the first thing I heard was the same eternal tune—the entire multitude singing chorus, although they had never practised it before. The mayor, a gentleman with a bald head mounted the deal rostrum, the front of which was boarded—the sounding board—and proposed three cheers for the prince, and proceeded to bellow away trumpery platitudes, in tone if his mouth had been open—not shut of phlegm. The instigators of the meeting had no resolutions to propose—nothing, verily, to end to achieve. Whenever the speakers broke down in their sentimental platitudes they called upon the people for a "Lebehoch" for Frederick VIII., or else they summoned the band to play some national air, which the people sang in full chorus, as well as though it had been part of a funeral ceremony. To say the truth, the whole of the grand opportunity was wasted in mere display. Instead of the greatest excitement here, a large part of the population of Schleswig-Holstein are called together, and they are entertained with the clatter of brass bands, the waving of hats, and the shouting of "Es lebe Frederick the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein." They whole adds that there was nothing to pay for the railway fare to Elmshorn; a free ticket was placed in each person's hand, and no one could say who was the liberal donor.

TRIUMPHAL ENTRY OF PRINCE FREDERICK INTO KIEL.

On the 30th ult., a little before noon, the Prince of Augustenburg landed from the steamer Patriot at Glückstadt, on the Elbe, having previously landed at Harburg without touching at either Hamburg or Altona, and was received there with great enthusiasm, and after giving audiences to the authorities at the railway station, proceeded on by a special train, and arrived at Kiel unexpectedly about four o'clock. The news of his arrival spread like wildfire through the town, and all the inhabitants, headed by the municipal authorities, flocked to the terminus to welcome him. The progress of the Duke through the town was a triumphal procession. He and those who accompanied him had to pass through a perfect shower of flowers on their way through the streets from the railway and back to the hotel at the station. The Duke rode bareheaded, and repeatedly thanked the people on all sides for the reception accorded him. At six in the evening a grand banquet was given, and in the hall was the most resplendent with light. At half-past eight the Duke rode through the town in a carriage, having with him Count Louis Reventlow (who has been his constant attendant in all his journeys), and two of the local senators, while the crowds around the carriage increased more and more, and cheered and waved their hats incessantly and with the national songs, became louder and louder. At times the progress was almost impeded by the crowds. At nine o'clock there was a tour which lasted for an hour, the Duke returned to the place whence he had started. The Duke rode bareheaded, and repeatedly thanked the "Zapfenstreich," which paraded the principal streets of the town, the Duke, Count Reventlow, and the local senators, with hymn, the chorus of which was shouted by thousands of excited threats.

CONCILIATORY PROCESSIONS AT KIEL IN HONOUR OF THE PRINCE.

On the last night of December the Prince of Augustenburg was assisted by persons of all classes, performed a Fackelzug, or procession by torchlight, through the streets of Kiel, which was a most imposing procession, accompanied by a band of music, and singing the national Schleswig-Holstein hymn. The prince was received with great enthusiasm at the hall, On arriving before the Prince's quarters at the Railway Hotel they stopped and cheered him vociferously, after which they proceeded to the residence of Professor Hegewisch, where the old academical song of "Gaudeamus igitur," and then threw their torches into a heap.

THE CONVENT OF ST. ONOFRIO.

THE painful tale of the life and sufferings of Torquato Tasso, one of Italy's most graceful bards, will ever remain a stigma upon the annals of that nation. Born at Sorrento, in the year 1544, and died during on the 25th of April, 1595, he passed the meridian of his life (from 1579 to 1586) in the prison of Sant' Anna, in Ferrara. Persecution and imprisonment of Tasso by the Duke Alphonso, his ultimate release through the intervention of the Duke of Mantua and the supplications of all Italy, the strong sympathies which he found at that period at the Convent of St. Onofrio, his death there on the eve of its celebration, and his interment in the church of the same convent, on the Janiculo, is undoubtedly well acquainted; but they will serve to throw a halo of interest around the spot. The following inscription (first written by Marini) on page 33. The hospitality of the monks to Tasso was repaid in their gratitude to him. For the convent (formerly) the Convent of St. Onofrio, on account of the conduct of its former gone, now occupying a building which ranks with Ariosto and Dante in the list of the glories of Italy.

The traveller, whose devotion to the memory of Torquato Tasso induces him to visit the convent of St. Onofrio on the Janiculo from the Eternal City by the Via Giulia, a narrow lane, which is a continuation of the Ponte Sisto, and passing by the Villa Farnesina, the great architect Sen Gallo, for his residence, and terminates at the lonely and ill-frequented piazza of St. Onofrio. This is filled in a small bark, ornamented with the image of St. Peter, and provided with an extensive view. For the convent, which is now (for the half-penny he will be transported in this bark to the opposite pre-cincture, across which he may ascend immediately to the convent himself with the recollection that he is ascending the famous Janiculo, one of the Seven Hills. After a while he will perceive a long lane, not less steep than the ascent from the river, but graced partly with brick and full of local colour. On the termination of this lane, which is not long, he will perceive a large pile in an open, the pilgrim can contemplate at once the desolation of the immortal Tasso. For a poet's cell, now transformed into a museum, is the sacred poets by the hostitable monks of St. Onofrio.

The convent is a large, but not vast mid-age, calm, tranquil, and sufficiently far from the rumours of the city to render it a fitting spot for a poet's repose. The cloisters (or colonnade) of the convent, which may be witnessed one of the most splendid views of Rome. Tasso's tomb is in the church of the convent, and is covered by ancient granite, of various dimensions, obtained from different ruins in the neighbourhood of Rome. The tomb, which is the production of cicerone shows with pride a beautiful Madonna by Leonardo da Vinci, and a picture of Domenichino, which the convent-guide had lost in war, to which the mask of the poet, moulded after nature, has been added. Many of the most distinguished literary characters of Italian genius preserved in this sad little chamber as an ante-chair and a writing-table, which the attendant-guide tells is an autograph letter, kept under a glass case.

The rule of the convent prohibited the admission of ladies within its walls. During several years the anniversary of the death of the unhappy poet was celebrated here with much pomp, and crowds of people visited the convent to pay their respects to the relics of their unfortunate Tasso. At length the multitude of visitors became so great that it was found necessary to limit the entrance to those who even arrived in such numbers that the monks, tormented by this noisy intrusion, determined to celebrate the poet's memory altogether on the anniversary of the death of the author of the imperishable "Gerusalemme Liberata."

REJOICINGS AT OLDHAM.

IN celebration of the attainment of his majority by Mr. Henry Platt, M.P., the eldest son of Mr. John Platt, upwards of 1,000 persons employed at the Hartford Works, Oldham, belonging to Messrs. Platt, Brothers, and Co., were entertained on Monday last by the principal members of the firm. The Hartford Works is a large establishment for the manufacture of cotton and woollen manufactures, and all the principal rooms in the building were appropriated for the festivities. The dinner took place in the basement, the people and their friends numbered nearly 8000, and the task of providing for this immense number was undertaken by Mr. Jennison, of the Bellevue Gardens. At two o'clock the tables on the basement, measuring 63 ft. by 150 ft.; the others, with the exception of that on the platform, were laid in the adjoining compartments of the room. The room on the third story was set apart as a hall and concert room. The dinner consisted of 1000 joints, 1000 fowls, 1000 tarts, and 1000 plum puddings. Tea was commenced at five o'clock, and was completed in about two hours, 1000 persons taking places. They were divided into four relays, about 2000 being supplied at a time. At the close of tea, which had a fine effect, the room was illuminated. One an idea may be formed of the provision made for this vast assemblage when we state that there were provided 1800 4 lb. loaves, 1200 currant loaves, 8000 biscuits, 6 chests of tea, 10 cwt. of sugar, and 1 cwt. of butter. The following gentlemen—Mr. Taylor, Royd, Ratcliffe, and Robinson; E. Hartley, F. Hughes, W. S. Mellor, W. Hartley, Hughes, Hartley, Mellor, Taylor, Hughes, J. Winterbottom, and W. Knott, some of the oldest workmen in the employment of the firm, presided at the tables in the basement and platform, and a circle was formed, round which the company assembled. The vast dome was then illuminated with gas, and the chandelier, richly gilt, containing an address to Mr. John Platt. Mr. James Taylor, one of the oldest workmen, presented the address, which was expressive of the good feeling of the workmen towards Mr. Platt and his family, congratulating them on the coming of age of Mr. Henry Platt. Mr. Taylor stated that the address had the unanimous approbation of the great body of the workmen, and it was presented as a token of the esteem in which they held Mr. Platt, his wife, and family. Mr. John Platt made a suitable reply, which was received with enthusiastic cheering. A supper was then provided for the company, and dancing provided for them. The immediate friends of Mr. Platt were entertained at a dinner, and the workpeople enjoyed themselves with dancing and other amusements. One Engraving on page 80 represents the ball-room at a period when the people were in the full swing of enjoyment. A portion of the room, as shown in the foreground of our illustration, was partitioned off for the use of Mr. Platt and his friends. The proceedings did not terminate until an early hour.

Similar rejoicings took place among the tenantry and the workmen employed on the family estate at Bryney-y-Newald, North Wales.

LETTER-WRITERS AND DEALERS IN CIGARETTES AT ROME

THE best, and, indeed, the only true way of thoroughly visiting a city, and particularly one like Rome, is to wander at leisure into these remote quarters, neglected by the authorities, where the ancient and modern habits and customs of the people are most singularly contrasted. The streets in such quarters, of which there are many at Rome, are filled by the aged constructions appear to have been raised, with their arched, interiors by windows of the most fantastic descriptions, adapted to the whims or requirements of successive generations.

Having discreetly donned the ordinary costume of the country, in order to avoid creating any feeling of inquisitiveness on the part of the common people, I sallied forth to obtain by my own observations into those narrow streets and half-hidden places which seem to have been made on purpose for philosophers and painters, will be enabled to contemplate at his ease many of the curiosities of the Roman population. Here, he will not fail to observe, at once all that is picturesque in the superb types of peasants draped in their cloaks and mixing with the ordinary inhabitants of the locality, and the dark-skinned countrywomen, whose sculptural forms are not disguised by their simple and original costume, to which the large linen cuffure gives a charming appearance.

In the course of exploring the ruins of the Theatre of Marcellus, especially on Sunday afternoon, another group attracted my attention, near a dirty-looking man who is sheltered by a large and tolerably dilapidated umbrella. This individual is the public letter-writer, and it is he who, for a few pence, couples for such of the unfortunate Roman people as do not know how to write, or who are too lazy, epistles, petitions and requests, demands, claims, and supplications to their Eminences of the Papal Government. Sometimes, by-the-by, he is very rare that their Eminences reply. The right to petition certainly exists, but on the other hand, there is no law which places any limit on the "pause for a reply."

The public letter-writer at Rome is ordinarily an old man, dressed as a gentilhomo. A ci-devant black coat, not too much worn, and his best hat, which he has mind is mostly superior to his vestments, and he is confidently relied upon to give advice and the benefit of his long experience in the conversations and discussions that take place hurriedly between the letter-writer and customers on the subject of their various misfortunes, to be duly recited and turned to graphic and classical account in the subsequent resulting petition or epistle.

Another peculiar kind of business, carried on in the same quarter, is that dealing in Italian Artist as it were, of the German boor, labours, is the trade in cigarettes, or pieces of partly-smoked cigars picked up by the poorer inhabitants of Roumilies, who peruse this melancholy occupation with imperturbability.

Cigarettes are a ready sale, and is either employed—horrible dictu—for chewing, or for smoking in the small wooden pipes used by the modern Romans.

Our Engraving is from a sketch recently taken by Marlani, who has introduced into his drawing one of those heavy gilded carriages of the Papal Government, the conclusion and ornamental work, says our Artist, certainly outweigh his Eminences pair or richly-caparisoned horses.

THE WINTER PASSAGE OVER MONT CENIS.

THE old road over Mont Cenis is still during winter the great high road between the north of Europe and Italy, although the railway from Modane to Susa, which already exists both in France and Switzerland north of the Alps, and from Susa to Turin, is completed. The traveller, south of them, yet no railway has at present penetrated through them. There are now two modes of passing the mountain by railway, that through France to Marseilles, and there by steamer to Genoa, or any other port on the north coast of Italy, and that by the Simplon and through the Austrian Tyrol; thirdly, by the Savoy railway to the foot of Mont Cenis, and over the mountain by diligence, or by the railway at Susa, on the Italian side. The first necessitates a sea passage from Marseilles to Genoa, and a long mountain railway journey. The old road over the mountain is therefore preferred, and, in an immense degree, is being maintained with the greatest regularity night and day during the whole of the winter. Between Bramin on the Italian side of the Alps, we think it may interest our readers to learn that some account of the way in which the road is kept open during the winter months, when all the ordinary passes in the mountains are blocked up with snow.

From Venice, Genoa and Milan, and all the great cities lying between them, there are regular railway accommodation, and connection with Turin. From this city it is intended to construct a railway to join the line on the north side of the Alps; at present it is only completed as far as Susa, at the foot of Mont Cenis, and here its remains in black and white for some years to come, for an enormous work of the largest magnitude ever undertaken need be completed before it can be used for the purposes of railway lines. This great work is nothing less than the construction of a tunnel under the Alps, which will be twenty-four miles in length—from the length of any tunnel yet formed; which great progress has already been made in its construction, but many years must elapse before a railway train passes through it.

Susa is an ancient town, and interesting in many respects, containing about 4000 inhabitants, is very well built, and decidedly clean for an Italian town. It is surrounded by high mountains, and protected by craggy eminences, between which are deep gorges through which the Dora Riparia flows. The mountains, and down the valley of which the river Doria-Riparia (the Doria Minor of Strabo), which has its source on Mont Cenis, are covered with vines, olives, chestnuts, and rocks, passing through the centre of the town on its way to the Italian lakes. The ruins of ancient castles on the craggy ridge which overhangs the town, the remains of Fort la Brunette, formerly considered one of the strongest fortresses in Italy. But we have spoken only of the inner valley, and the Alpine scenery. Ascending upon mountain, the largest called the Roche Melon, shuts in the valley from the north, and on the left hand the lower slopes of these mountains are covered with farms, rich woods, pastures, and vineyards.

Susa, the ancient Segusio, was the capital of Piedmont, under its Marquises. It was also the residence of a prince of Piedmont, and is frequently called the key of Italy; it guarded both the roads to Italy by Mont Cenis and Mont Genèvre; in its days it was closely watched that a stranger, on being observed to stop and look at it for a moment, was arrested as a spy. There are many ancient and interesting antiquities in the town. The cathedral is an old building raised upon the ruins of some vast Roman edifice; but the most interesting relic is the triumphal arch, called the Arch of Cottius. This triumphal arch was erected by Cottius, who was King of the Segusian tribes under the emperor Augustus I., on the road leading to Mont Genèvre. There is no road under it now; it is surrounded by old buildings and houses, and the level of the road is above the arch; there is another arch, through which passed what may be called the old road from Susa to Turin, which was the only road until the present magnificent one was made by Napoleon I.

The point of view from which we have taken the view of Susa on page 61 is on the upper side of the town, at the point where the modern road crosses the old one. It shows the cathedral and the town generally, also the three entrances into Italy; the ancient one, under the arch of Cottius, dedicated to a Roman Emperor (that on the right of the Engraving); that which passes under the arch in the centre, made by an Italian King; and the present great road, made by a French Inspector.

The traveller journeying northward reaches Susa from any part of Italy, whether by railway or diligence, and every incident is of the deepest interest, having arrived here, everything is changed. A different class of people take charge of him; he rides in a different class of vehicle, and travels through a country whose characteristics are peculiar to itself. The journey of Mont Cenis is performed in the night and early morning; three trains from Turin reach Susa every day, at which place the old track is now going to be used, and the most perfect quiet exists everywhere; but on the arrival of the train from the station and its thousand and one luggage vans, the scene changes. Here a post-chaise, there a diligence, and hundreds of mules are in the streets, while railway officials of all kinds, porters, horse-keepers, postilions, and many diligence drivers throng the sheds, yards, and avenues outside the station. Inside these are tables laden with good fare, round which sat the travellers who are about to pass over the mountain, for which they make ample preparation by adding to their comforts of the coffee, bundy, and wine.

At length the general muster takes place in the station-yard, the luggage is stowed away on the top and the travellers are packed inside the heavy diligences, which are drawn by three or four horses. Susa amidst a blaze of torchlights, accompanied by a great cracking of whips, shouting and blowing of horns, the diligences drawn by a double team of horses and mules, as many as sixteen or twenty being harnessed to a single vehicle. The postilions, the driver and the conductor or general manager, beside the principal driver and his assistant. The leading horses have bunches of jingling bells hung over the ears, the river are soon passed, and then the horses toil up the steep road which winds under the rocks upon which the old castle stands, and over the bridge over which the old road to Turin and Susa crossed Italy. Beyond this the scene becomes highly picturesque. Each diligence has a front of its own to help prevent the snow from shoot their long rays of bright light between the lines of horses and mules and light up the road and the rocks right and left of this illuminated tract there is an almost pitchy darkness, from which mysterious forms emerge, and almost distant snow-covered mountains faintly emerge, and the traveller can make out that there is a great road to be travelled, although his light is see it properly. On go the line of diligences very slowly, for they are climbing up the side of a mountain, the road winding beside the horses, shouting and cracking their whips, while the bells on the horse are jingling merrily. The express vehicle soon gets far ahead, and a curious effect is presented by the lights of the passing along apparently in the air and in a different direction to that which would be kept after the fact is understood that they are on the zigzag road; and what this is passing along so much above, a diligence in the rear will be seen toiling along beneath it. Those in the rear will doubtless be failing and a difficulty be experienced in making out objects in the snow; but it will be seen that the road is made in winding round the sides of the mountains, and that tremendous flanks of rock are perpendicularly up on one side, while on the other there is a fearful precipice, from going over which we are only guarded by a row of stone posts placed at short distances between them. Occasionally a torrent of water falls into a hollow cavity in the rock on one side of the road, and, passing under it, thunders down into the valley below. The travellers, however, do not much trouble the passengers; they have faith in the skill of the drivers, and the workmanship of the diligences is doubtless, are all fast asleep, every one with an iron tank of hot water under his feet, for everything is done by the passengers in the route to make the journey as comfortable as possible. After a time, however, the air suddenly becomes colder, and the travellers have to change carriages, for they have arrived at the plateau of Cenis. Every stop and start is made with a great noise in snow, to their great astonishment, for there was no snow in the valley when they started. Here, on the plateau, according to them on emerging from their snug, warm berths in the diligences is quite insufficient; there is everywhere—thick over head and deep under foot. Carriages of all descriptions are assembled, and people are covered with it; merchandise and baggage lie about loose in it; there is a long train of diligences with lights in the windows; but no one tries to get in, for the door is blocked up with it; numerous sledges, people not requiring them, and other light moving circles, for they are mowed and frosted all over. The effect of all this is extraordinary, for it is the first time that travellers see the blinding bull's-eye lights of the diligences, together making bright luminous, the bewildered passengers, and wonderingly ask what has happened; perhaps the train of diligences has come in collision with an avalanche; but in fact no harm has happened, and the travellers again snugly stowed away in a compact little omnibus, which has sledge runners instead of wheels; the whole length has been packed away safely, and all are off again, the carriage which is generally over the snow without the least noise, drawn by four or six mules, and so past the plateau, through the Cenis tunnel, and the little square buildings in which the cantonniers live. Here the road is kept by Europeans, and the carriage is made, as houses of refuge. Then, as the day breaks, we pass this gloomy and inhospitable lake where a number of Alpine rose trees are seen.

At last it is broad daylight, and we have reached the summit of Mont Cenis. The mules are detached, and a single animal placed in the shafts of the sledge; away it dashes down the steep and rough road, followed by a train of others. There is no sleeping now; every one looks about, and endeavours to make out something of his whereabouts through the driving snow. We pass some villages where ice-crowned houses come out and salute the driver as he dashes past. The road winds round the sides of the mountains, and at times frightfully sharp turns; and here we can often see those ahead of us rushing on apparently round the face of the rock, and those in the rear are tearing along high up overhead. Sometimes we look down into precipitous valleys, and see the road we have passed over in the plain of snow by the little church-towers and the larger buildings which dot through it. At last we arrive at the foot of a long slip of the snow (which is an avalanche) from the side the huge mountains may destroy in a few moments the labour of days; regards its effect upon the repose of the whole scene, be an event of little more importance than that of a feather being borne upon the wind.

The last turn of this division of the road is at last reached, the Laisle-Bardo, where a crowd of people are waiting to welcome them—hotel waiters, soldiers, officials, and others. Here the coffee ready in the hotels, made thick with cream, handed to the travellers as they step from the diligences. Here the last of the mules in the snow on Mont Cenis will not fail to make him appreciate the attention paid to his wants by the great Napoleon, Napoleon le Grand.

Here the snug little sleighs are abandoned, and the travellers again enter the railway carriages. The engine-drivers having conveyed the stowage of the luggage, get up into the banquettes, then there is a cracking of whips, a loud shouting and a rattling as the whole train is each drawn by six or eight horses, through the narrow streets of quaint little towns where the houses have their upper stories projecting and wooden galleries round the upper stories, quite Swiss in character, and bridges, which in high torrents flung the white spray about as they leap from rock to rock; now and then a wooden bridge, which boundaries seem interminable, for we see them rising above us until lost in the snow of the mountains which seem to close in the valley. Then we emerge into an open valley, with rich pastures and nicely-formed waterways running on each side of it, as well as the numerous and huge hillocks of rock and soil, upon which grow little forests. These themselves are at times, at the mountains of the valley, that have at different periods detached themselves from the mountains, and are now covered plentifully with trees, which mark their present position. Then the valley narrows again; huge mountains tower up before us, and a torrent appears rushing and foaming below. On a great jutting mass of rock is the vast fortress of Lesseline, completely covered with every work that can make it strong and terrible; its outworks are seen upon the distant hills, and some of them carried the road over which we travel. Further on we pass the works at the north end of the tunnel of Mont Cenis; then, for a few miles, beside a bright, noisy river; and we enter the railway station in the old town of St. Michel.

Here our journey over Mont Cenis ends. The railway we have reached will carry us through the beautiful valleys of Savoy, whose sloping sides are often hidden by the rich vines that grow upon them; soon we emerge into the open plains of France; and, passing Macon, Chalons, and Fontainebleau, on the next day the traveller dines in Paris.

[From our Special Correspondent.]

Lancashire is now capable of Cotton Famine—I am not Satisfied.—I am amongst those who think that, had the landowners, whose seats have been enhanced in value by the wealth which the cotton trade has created, refuse their fair share of the burden, and had the whole of the Lancashire rates been levied upon the owners of the property which alone makes the cotton trade of some who refrained from making capital of the bad times, and set about with eagerness to make the most of the opportunity, those who were called upon to feel them first, as appeal to the public would have been needless. At the same time, the whole country may be thankful for this episode in the career of manufacturing industry. Much information has been drawn out, which have benefited as well those from whom they sprung as those who have been benefited by the results of working together in the bonds of fellowship now. Nothing could be more noble than the way in which the operatives have sacrificed their own interests in their desire to support the peaceful foreign policy of the Government, and the sacrifices they have undergone to allow them to make the sacrifice alone. The course which the one had the right courage to take, the other who met the ungrudgingly substantially to approve; and, though the whole country was expecting such labour organisation as that which has existed in Lancashire, held from those whose means of livelihood were immediately cut off, as it were, by the act of self-abnegation. This will be a page in England's history that will not be forgotten for centuries.

It is my firm conviction that, when the misery of the distress is removed from the public memory, and the cotton trade with it with redoubled splendour, the cotton famine will be regarded as one of the most important events in history. It has changed the course of the establishment of a grand precedent. A nation deliberately counting the cost of a principle, and determining to pay it, has advised a fraternal feeling amongst the classes of working men in this country which was unknown before. It has taught us the lesson of the vast frightful chasm which was growing wider and wider between the rich and the poor, and which, by the existence of a large portion of the population in the high tide of prosperity and relative freedom from poverty, displayed in a very marked manner the benefits of provident habits which are open to all. It has taught us the value of the acquirement by the girls in the sewing-schools of such habits as shall conduce to economy and thrift. It has displayed the value of a young man in the absorbing pursuit of the mere necessaries of life and delight his fellow-creatures by the use of it. It has been a source of happiness as the endeavour to feed and clothe the body; it has done something more than this—it has developed the mental faculties and unveil in the extreme; it has done much everywhere to inculcate habits of economy, and to encourage the working man to purchase with the market, and both to masters and men in their mutual dependence; it will have done much to improve the health of the communities it has affected, by setting them at liberty to live in more open air, open light, and beautify their streets, cleanse their rivers, increase their water supply, and improve the drainage of their surrounding grounds; and, when its history shall have been written, it will be found to have developed many principles of which we are unconscious are amongst the results which it has evolved.

The reason why I am induced to dwell upon this winter to display its ready benevolence is because its former liberality was so great as to make it difficult to believe that it could be repeated. Executive Relief Committee; a second is because, under the provisions of the Public Works Act, the Government, through the medium of the municipal authorities, invested with power of town government, commissioners, or boards of guardians, are enabled to borrow money for certain purposes, and boards of guardians are enabled to borrow money of the Public Works Commissioners, "to provide employment for the distressed operatives by the execution of works of permanent and sanitary improvement."

The Public Works Act was a happy device for meeting a difficulty which was really alarming. A man cannot long resist the inevitable law of nature that he must work or starve; and the Government were in time to broken down by a continuous subsidy. And that this demoralising process would have been commenced in the case of such a million of people, was quite impossible. It was felt that a splendid fund had to be dealt with, and that the character of the people and that it would never do to continue to hand the operatives the weekly pittance without exacting from them the sense of having earned it. Educational and other tests were in their effect very fallacious, and shifting heaps of earth—useless occupations fit only for the degraded—were not to be thought of. Hence arose the idea that there is dignity in human labour.

The works commenced, and were soon eminently needed. Of late years there has here and there been somewhat done by the Local Boards for the health of towns, but much still remains to be done. Habitable; but to make them healthy scarcely anything has been done. Take, for instance, the town of Preston. Situated into the locality has come to weave or spin cotton and to build cottages and mills. Cottages have been built, and mills have been built, the formation of roads, the cleansing of rivers, have been enterprises from which more than ordinary profit was looked for. Labour has been "too dear," and everybody has been "too busy to attend to sanitary matters. They were left to a more convenient season, which has come at last, and proved itself of immense importance. In the first instance, during any tour of inspection the previous Christmas, to call attention to the filthy and irregular state of the streets, and to the accumulations of putrescent matter of certain very pretentious townhalls. No rope and much of the paving was loose, and the drainage of the carriage was prohibited; the deep ruts were sufficient to deter any one who had respect for their clothes from walking through the streets. The formation of roads, the cleansing of rivers, have been enterprises from which more than ordinary profit was looked for. Labour has been "too dear," and everybody has been "too busy to attend to sanitary matters. They were left to a more convenient season, which has come at last, and proved itself of immense importance. In the first instance, during any tour of inspection the previous Christmas, to call attention to the filthy and irregular state of the streets, and to the accumulations of putrescent matter of certain very pretentious townhalls. No rope and much of the paving was loose, and the drainage of the carriage was prohibited; the deep ruts were sufficient to deter any one who had respect for their clothes from walking through the streets. The received, were aware of certain bricks, and stones, and bits of earthenware, by means of which they could pick their way to a well-well-measured leap, arrive in comparative cleanliness on the ill-paved or unpaved footways. Now all the principal streets are generally well-the receptacles of the cinders and garbage of the dwellings are taken them, and, three times or three feet above their proper level, look like long mounds seamed with ruts. The streets are now paved and the side-bottoms, then held unwillingly in the schools, should be employed in paving the streets, and in the like manner. The same feeling was expressed by others, and, presently, Mr. Robert Rawlinson, C.E., was directed by the Government to visit Lancashire, and on her Majesty's Government to report upon the matter. Mr. Rawlinson soon came to a report which was a most valuable document (expressing in population about 1,500,000 persons and a net rateable value of £3,500,000) which will be the text-book of all future improvements of a beneficial character. The expenditure of this sum would relieve the distress for a year, but it was not to be spent in this direct employment of 12,564 factory operatives for one year, at the rate of £5 per week, and the remaining 38. Mr. Farnall thought that, in the employment of skilled labour in the preparation of plans and supervision, the outlay of the proposed sum would altogether remain in the district, and that the 50 per cent. from charitable funds, the annual cost of whose maintenance in consequence of the cotton famine, was £1,000,000 sterling, agreed that 75 per cent of the entire sum would be circulated in the distressed districts.

It was consequently determined to lend the £1,500,000 under conditions expressed in the Act. For instance, the amount borrowed must not exceed one year's rateable value of the property assessable within the district to be benefited. The interest is at the rate of £3 10s. per cent; thirty years is given for repayment by annual instalments; and all applications will be ad idem of July next. The terms of Lancashire will thus get their improvements on the easiest terms. I estimate that an annual rate of about 2s. per house will pay principal and interest in thirty years; in other words, the rate, to the same period, will be about 6d. in the pound per annum.

The Act was obtained too late last Session to allow of the commencement of the works with large forces during the autumn. Plans and specifications must be submitted to the Poor-law Board; thence they pass to the Treasury, which has to say whether the projected works are of a proper kind, and the security is sufficient. The loan is then offered by instalments, each instalment being preceded by official inspection.

Notwithstanding the hindrances that have arisen from the indecision of several corporate bodies to adopt the Local Government Act, or from their want of unanimity as to the nature and extent of the proposed improvements, the public works have been commenced in almost forty different localities; and applications have been made, I understand, for loans amounting to nearly a million of money under the new Act. The most important of the towns I visited; but the main portion of the works are yet to be carried on during the next week's Impression.

At Blackburn is distinguished in our present Number by an Illustration, I will conclude with a few details concerning the works so splendidly carried out there. With a population of 63,126, the town applied for by the Corporation is just equal to the number of 1,500 looms. There is business here; and Mr. Smith, the Borough Surveyor, and Mr. Eccles, the Corporation Engineer, have had their sharp work to prepare for the 800 new now employed. As early as April, 1863, the Corporation resolved to apply for the loan of £50,000 as an arrangement by which able-bodied deserving poor relieved by both the Relief Committee and the Guardians should be set to work at slightly-increased rate. This department was managed by a joint committee, under the presidency of the Mayor, Mr. Alderman Hornby, Alderman Mr. James Henderson; and many valuable public improvements have been carried on under their supervision. When the Public Works Act was passing through Parliament this committee, with Mr. Rawlinson's sanction, anticipated it, and at once employed 600 men to work. At the present time 450 of the 800 are employed in the paint labour-yard, but, so soon as the Corporation have completed their arrangements, the whole 800 will be all employed directly by that body, and paid regular wages. As it is, the Guardians pay the wages at a regular rate, and at an increase for the labour done by the men employed by them, and the committee applaud the system as the best that could be devised to meet the want the wants of a large family or other pressing necessity of each single workman. The men work nine hours and a half per week, in every case 10 ft. 6 in. below the ground floors of the houses; together with two or three exceptions, the whole of the work has been done by hand. In the Blackburn Act, the Corporation have applied for £150,000 for pitching the land on their estate (as at Bolton), £5000. In the sewers I found gange of twenty-five operatives working at the Newkbridge; they earn from 2s. to 2s. 11d. daily. Those who were unskilled, but were quiet, steady, and enjoy the work. To show the noble spirit that exists, I must mention that eighteen operatives employed who have taken a contract direct from the Corporation. They have hung themselves from the Corporation. They have given five on their own, and divide their profits according to the families of the men employed. I found 11 men working at the Preston-road, upon the face of the work at 30s. above the level of the Preston-road, upon the face of the work at 30s. above the level of the Preston-road, upon the face of the work at 30s. above the level of celebrated "Bull" in the Haghe, and, in our opinion, surpassing the Dutch master's chef-d'œuvre in truth to animal character—was purchased for £1500 for the National Gallery (British School), and is now at South Kensington.

THE RUINS OF COPAN.

THE accompanying Engravings are from a series of photographic views of the ruins of Copan, Central America, taken by Mr. Osbert Salvin, and recently published by Messrs. Smith and Beck, of Cornhill. The ruins of Copan are situated in the republic of Honduras, close to the frontier of Guatemala, on the bank of a river of the same name, and in a valley two thousand feet above the level of the sea, flanked by mountains on both sides, rising a thousand or fifteen hundred feet above the river. The road from the coast, after crossing the Mico mountain, follows the river Montagua to the junction of the river Copan, or Xacapa, as it is there called. It then takes the valley of the affluent, occasionally mounting the steep banks to avoid a long bend or projecting headland. Just where the ruins stand, and for a short distance up and down the river, the valley opens out into a small alluvial plain of great fertility. Over this plain, wherever the vegetation has been left untouched, forest grows. It would be difficult to determine how far the ruins extend throughout the valley, as sculptured stones are to be seen all along the road leading to what appears to be the central point of the ruins; and remains are found several leagues away. The traveller comes unexpectedly upon sculptured fragments in almost every direction, and the natives point in the hills to a painted stone here and a carved stone there. The ruins of Copan comprise the walls of a supposed temple, 624 ft. in length, and many pyramidal structures, with sculptured idols resembling the remains of Egyptian or Hindoo art. Wherever walls and pyramids occur, sculptured stones of all sizes lie scattered in profusion, some bearing hieroglyphics, others fragments of limbs; but more with less traceable design. With the exception of a few monoliths, hardly any of the ruins remain undisturbed. The terraces and pyramidal mounds have had their steps and stonework almost universally displaced. The mere force of the roots of the trees which grow upon and between the stones, or even the earthquakes to which they must have been subjected from time to time, seem insufficient to account for so general a dislocation.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAYS.

WE in England are apt to arrogate to ourselves, individually and collectively, a character for thoughtfulness, prevision, and practical dealing with all our affairs. The right of private judgment is so much talked about and insisted upon, that it may be supposed to be universally acted upon with the strictest self-dependence. But the real fact is, that we are essentially gregarious in our tastes and habits, a great deal so in our enterprises, and remarkably so in our speculations. In most things we unconsciously follow in a flock some influential but invisible bell-wether, which often proves as tricksy a leader as a will-o'-the-wisp. This applies especially to what we complacently call our speculations. Lately the whole world of speculators were unanimous in determining to provide a well-constituted hotel for every traveller who visited the metropolis or any of our principal towns. Then it seemed good to them that banks should, so to speak, be brought home to every man's door. At present the whole tribe of speculators, engineers, and secretaries seem to have turned their attention to projects for covering the surface and driving beneath the whole of this metropolis with railways. The matter has really become most serious, and will require a decided course on the part of the Legislature in the ensuing Session.

In the first place, two of the most powerful of those modern enchanters who go about changing the face of the earth—namely, Messrs. Hawkshaw and Fowler, the engineers—have separate plans for covering London—the town itself—with a network of railways. Besides them, Sir Charles Fox, and we know not how many others, have got their sectional projects, which in a manner come into competition with the more comprehensive schemes of their scientific brethren.

It is a curious fact that there seems to be no difficulty in obtaining the capital necessary for carrying out the metropolitan railway projects which are to be brought before Parliament this year. The deposits required by statute, and which have already been paid on these new metropolitan projects alone, amount to no less than £4,000,000. There were twenty-six plans for new railways in London devised, of which seven only have dropped through, and not all of these in consequence of any difficulty in obtaining the funds necessary for deposit. A scheme of the Blackwall Railway Company for a communication with the Great Northern and Midland lines is one of those which have been abandoned. One of the Thames Tunnel Railway projects has collapsed, and the almost monstrous plan for a Thames viaduct, by which a line of railway was to have been carried from Westminster to London Bridge along the centre of the river, has come to grief. The same fate has befallen a certain Paddington and Charing-cross line, which was to have run under the parks. The list of the abortive plans comprises also the London Union Railway, which proposed to bring the London and North-Western at Kilburn into connection with the South-Eastern at the Bricklayers' Arms by a line through Pimlico and Lambeth; the London Low-level Railway, which was to have passed underground from Kensington, by Victoria-street, the Thames Embankment, and New Cannon-street, to Walbrook and Finsbury-circus; and, lastly, the Blackfriars Embankment line, by which the Metropolitan Railway in Farringdon-street was to have been brought to the Thames Embankment near Blackfriars Bridge. So much for the failures.

But there remain still nineteen schemes which, by the payment of deposits, are in a manner launched before Parliament. Amongst them are the Oxford-street and City Railway; the Metropolitan Grand Union, the Metropolitan District, both connected with the Thames Embankment; the Charing-cross Northern Extension to Camden-town; the Hampstead and Charing-cross Junction, intended to run under Tottenham-court-road; the Tottenham and Hampstead Extension from Highbury to Charing-cross; and the North and South London Junction, which by its title would seem to be very comprehensive indeed. In the City, there are the North and South London High-level Junction, which would run from the North London across the Thames to the Brighton station; and the London Main Trunk Underground Railway, which proposes to create convenient communication between all the City and West-end railways by a line from the Metropolitan Railway at Finsbury-pavement through Houndsditch, Aldgate, and so on to the intended great station at Cannon-street.

It would thus appear that if half these projects are carried out every principal street in London is trembling to its fall, and the foundations of every public building are in danger of being sapped. Every dweller in this great city is aware of the inconvenience caused in our chief thoroughfares by the reconstruction of the great main drainage scheme, carried on by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the making of the one existing Underground Railway. It may be remembered that until the plan of the Thames Embankment was carried out, the construction of part of the main drainage plan involved the entire stoppage of the traffic of the Strand for two years, was supposed to endanger the base of Somerset House, and necessitated, as it has, the foundations of St. Paul's Cathedral. If the band of engineers connected with half these metropolitan schemes are let loose upon the town, every great thoroughfare must be blocked up, and vehicles and all other traffic driven into narrow side streets for a period ranging from three to five years. Imagine the effect upon the huge mass of London daily movement.

Of course all this is intended to meet an acknowledged and growing evil—the wicked traffic of our principal streets; but it is just a question, when all is done—for the benefit of the next generation be it observed—whether the desired object, of having roadways clear or sparsely sprinkled with omnibuses and waggons and only so many passengers for foot-ways as to make a cheerful appearance, will be attained. What may be called the door-to-door requirements of London traffic cannot be met by any system of railways. A vast omnibus service must be depended at particular hours by any railway. If an elderly lady wishes to go from Charing-cross to Fleet-street, her object is now accomplished by means of an omnibus, which can stop anywhere; whereas, in the case of a metropolitan railway she would have to go to a station perhaps a quarter of a mile beyond her point of destination, which distance she would have to walk back, a very serious consideration to the elderly lady. In a word, the enormous bills of metropolitan railways would materially assist in thinning the overgrown traffic of our streets; but the most really effectual plan would be the strict regulation of the passage of vehicles in two continuous lines, by which means, although there would be less appearance of haste, there would, in fact, be more speed. As matters now stand, the prospects afloat are absolutely alarming; and the wildness and immensity of the metropolitan railway scheme is a matter which even Parliament must be dealt with by a strong hand. It is believed that all these plans will be temporarily arrested by the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the whole subject, something of the kind seems really to be indispensable.

FRANCE.

The debate upon the address continues in the Corps Législatif. On Thursday week M. Thiers made a powerful speech in support of the freedom of election. The Protectionist amendment was brought forward on Friday by M. Pouyer-Quertier, and condemned the policy of the free-trade tone of the address. M. Chevalier argued against the amendment. He said that M. Thiers was wrong when he said he signed it were great admirers of liberty. He would beg to tell them that this sanctioment was anti-liberal; and to M. Thiers especially he would say that, when he had laid down the five conditions which he thought essential to every free country, he had forgotten the most important of all, which was liberty of the press. That was one of the great conquests of '89, and it was one which involved no danger; that was a liberty which should be granted to every citizen; they would ask those who were so fond of taking England as a model in political matters why they did not follow her example in regard to free trade. After a debate on Tuesday in the Corps Législatif on the amendment relative to liberty of journals, by means of the suppression of the law upon coalitions of working men, it was rejected by 135 to 84. Four speeches of the ultra-party have been made.

The ceremony of conferring the Cardinal's hat upon Monseigneur de Bonnechose was performed by Monseigneur Naploone in the chapel of the Tuileries, on Thursday week, with considerable formality and display. When the ceremony was over the company retired to the Salon of the Pope Council. There the new Cardinal was presented in his purple robes to the Emperor, to whom he made a speech expressing in thanks for having just conferred upon him. In reply, the Emperor took the opportunity to make a declaration of the light in which he views the efforts of the Opposition to obtain a little more liberty for France. He was, he said, "astonished to see, at so short an interval, assembly except those who were desirous of seeing new tempests to their resistance." But "God protects France too visibly to permit the spirit of evil to one more time overthrow her." Every honest man may be at ease within the limits of the French Constitution; and "nearly every one of you is in the habit every day expressing his ideas, of controlling the acts of the Government, and of taking an equitable part in public affairs." The Emperor, however, did not fail to improve upon the clerical theme, the great importance of being tolerant and conciliatory—of combining love of country with zeal for religion.

The ratifications of the treaty of commerce and of the navigation convention concluded between France and Italy were exchanged on Tuesday by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the Chevalier Nigra, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the King of Italy.

Ferdinand Alphonse Hasenkia, a distinguished Admiral in the French navy, Senator and Grand Chancellor of the Empire, died on Saturday last. He had been an ardent supporter of Napoleon in his capacity as a cordial and brave colleague of the late Admiral Dundas in the Black Sea during the Crimean War, and was decorated with the great grand cross of the English Order of the Bath, as Dundas had received that of the French Legion of Honour. He was born Sept. 3, 1793, at Pont l'Evêque (Calvados).

Mrs Eliza Lumley, the niece of the former lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, made her début at the Italian Opera in Paris yesterday se'nnight in the "Traviata," and obtained a decided triumph. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano, of a fine quality. She and Pranchini were repeatedly called for, and the stage was strewn with bouquets, some of which, however, were intended for the favourite tenor, whose last appearance it was previous to his departure for Madrid.

The Senate has been in the throes of a reform debate, the result of which has been to throw out the Ministerial Bill. A Government motion that the "reform bill" should be voted article by article was thrown out by 93 against 85 votes. Ministers therefore tendered their resignations, which the Queen accepted. A new Administration is announced, but it is not thought likely to last long. It is composed as follows:—President, Bravo Murillo; Foreign Affairs, Minister of Justice, Sevico Alvarez; Finances, Senor Trupita; Interior, Senor Benavides; War, Senor Fernandez de Cordova; Senor Castro; Pulpo Weeks, Senor Mocyano.

The Diritto has been seized for publishing the proclamation, which is considered by the Turin Ministry seditious.

The Pope received a deputation on Monday, numbering about 300 members, from the Roman Catholics of different countries, to present them with an address. The address declares their opposition to the usurpation of my portions of the Holy See. His Holiness received the address very graciously, but in his answer he said that the only compromise which would diminish the patrimony of the Church. He declared that he prized the Temporal Power of the Holy See, but in Providence and justice.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

In the Federal Diet on Thursday week, as announced in our last number, the proposition of Austria and Prussia, that Holstein should be occupied by federal troops as a means of compelling Denmark to withdraw the Constitution of the 18th of November, was lost by the opposition of Bavaria, Saxony, and Hanover. Austria then put up an ultimatum declaration that Austria and Prussia would take matters into their own hands, and the declaration on the part of the two Powers at the great leading German Powers announced than it was acted upon. Notwithstanding this declaration the Saxon Government decided on the repeal of the Constitution of the 18th of November, and on Sunday at Breslau between military officers of Prussia and Austria and railway engineers commissioned to make all the necessary plans for conveying the Austrian troops by the Lower Silesian line, so as to avoid passing through Saxony. The concentration of troops were to commence on Wednesday.

The review of the Austrian corps destined for Schleswig took place on Monday afternoon. Field-Marshal-Lieutenant Von Gablenz will take the command of the troops, whose strength will be about 20,000. The Emperor Francis Joseph, on the 19th, at 10 o'clock in the morning, assembled you for a farewell greeting. Keep on good terms with your Prussian colleagues. If they say to you, 'Come to your duty as it you were at home; and, should it come to blows, will show your courage.'

Prince Frederick Charles will command the Prussian contingent, which, according to the Berlin Post, will consist of 30,000 infantry. We are further told by telegraph, "That portion of the 3rd Army Corps which is to be employed in Holstein will be placed on a war footing. The reserves of the Guards and the 4th Army Corps are being called in. The artillery of the Guards and one battalion of infantry of the 4th Army Corps have received orders to hold themselves in readiness to march." It was only on the most urgent representations on the part of the Prussian Government that the King of Prussia, that the King of Hanover sanctioned the march of Prussian troops through his territories.

The Austro-Prussian ultimatum was, it is semi-officially announced, delivered to the Diet on Thursday week. In it the two Powers declared that King Christian should revoke the November Constitution, and, in default of compliance, they would, at the end of a refusal, the Berlinal says, "they threaten all the misfortunes of a war, commencing with the withdrawal of their Ambassadors." According to a telegram from Berlin, the demand addressed to Denmark "is not only a question of annulling at once the November Constitution, and was not an ultimatum, as the ultimatum will not be forwarded until the Austrian and Prussian troops have entered the Duchies, and the actual terms will be then communicated." The ultimatum or ultimatum, the demand is understood to have been rejected by Denmark. The Danish Ministry declare that they never believed to be now on their way back to their respective Courts. Count Rechberg, it is said, has left Copenhagen for Vienna, and Count Bellesheim of the Bigsdag, or special assembly for the Kingdom, fortify the Government in its resolution. At an entertainment given on Thursday week by King Christian to the members of the Bigsdag he declared that he could not give way to the demands which he said that the Danes were determined to remain a free and independent people, that the new Constitution was the fundamental law of the land. In reply, King Christian solemnly promised ever to uphold the liberty and independence of his country, and to maintain the rights of his people.

In an address of the Bigsdag to his Majesty, they express their satisfaction at his determination to maintain the independence of Denmark, and assure him that any sacrifices will be willingly borne by the people to preserve the inseparable union between Sedeseg and the kingdom.

The Danish troops are concentrating their strength and making every preparation which the season allows against an attack from Germany.

The German Powers, and declares that the Schleswig question will be brought to a solution with honour and profit, or with disgrace and loss, according as Germany keeps within or oversteps the limits of legality. The Saxon envoy declares in reply that the Germans—M.P., Burgesses, Sawyer, Lorentzen, &c.—have also settled in private lodgings in the same neighborhood.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the North American we have news from New York to the 16th inst.

There had been some skirmishes and minor engagements in Western Virginia and in the neighbourhood of Winchester, and their result seems to have been generally advantageous to the Federalists. At Chattanooga all was quiet, and General Joseph Johnstone was understood to be concentrating the Confederate troops in the neighbourhood of Dalton. An expedition sailed from New Orleans on the 30th ult., and it was generally understood that it was positively to be, as was supposed that the forces would at first proceed to Pensacola, and would thence proceed against Mobile. On Christmas Day the Federals bombarded Charleston with great effect. The Confederates erected a battery on Sullivan's Island, and did considerable injury to the gun-boat Marble Head. Two other gun-boats went to her assistance, drove off the enemy, and destroyed the battery.

Everything shows the determination of the North to prosecute the war to the utmost. The President has issued a bill empowering the Congress to offer liberal bounties to volunteers up to the end of February, as the suppression of bounties had almost stopped recruiting. By the new arrangement Government demanded a bill, providing for 400 dols. to re-enlisting volunteers, 300 dols. to new volunteers, and 100 dols. to drafted men. A resolution was passed by the 1,000,000 volunteers should be called out for ninety days, and should be placed under the command of General Butler. It is under consideration to the Senate's Military Committee. The House of Representatives has passed a resolution declaring that all proposal for negotiation with the "rebels" should be immediately and unhesitatingly rejected. The Senate has passed a resolution for the election of a President, and his reappointment has been urged in the House of Representatives. The proposal in the latter case was that the election would ensure emancipation throughout the Union. In the same connection, the Governor of Maryland, in his message to the State Legislature, has urged the necessity of adopting a pre-free forward gradual emancipation in the State. A delegation of citizens had left Annapolis for Washington to arrange for the terms of entering the Union.

Governor Seymour in his message to the New York Legislature, had recommended measures for the protection of the State banks against the issue of paper money. He had denounced it as a fatal failure, and had declared that President Lincoln had assumed powers which subordinated the civil to the military authority. The Governor declares that the country can only be saved from ruin by the Administration suffering the will of the people constitutionally to be enforced. He is no Republican press are incensed against the message. The New York Times declares that the Governor's sympathies are with the South. The New York Tribune denounces him as a traitorous and malignant enemy of his country.

Extensive shipments from New York to the South have come to light, and more arrests have been made.

It was recently discovered that the War Department disclosed the fact that W. B. Hilton, a printer in New York, was engaged, under false declarations, in printing counterfeit postage stamps, revenue stamps, bonds, &c., to the South, and that he was about to extend the business on a more comprehensive and enjoyed establishment. Hilton was arrested and consigned to Fort Lafayette. In his possession a million dollars in Confederate bonds were found, ready for signature.

A gubernatorial election was buried in New York with great ceremony on the 7th inst. An immense concourse of people was present. The shops were closed, and all public business was suspended.

Four negroes called at the Executive mansion, Washington, on New-Year's Day, and were presented to Mr. Lincoln. This is the first occurrence of the kind.

Signal stations, occupied by a small garrison, are to be established along the Mississippi, for the superintendence of the navigation, and since with a recommendation from President Lincoln and the Secretary of War.

The Federals have constructed upwards of 5000 miles of military telegraph, and have employed 6000 men at times during the past year at least 1,200,000 telegrams were sent along these lines—about 3000 a day.

A declaration has been signed between France and Spain for the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of commerce of 1862. It is to commence at Carthagena, in the Mediterranean, and to end at Oran, on the Spanish coast.

The Duke of Brunswick's collection of diamonds consists of one weighing 18 carats with a whitish tint, another an opaque black diamond of 12 carats, and a third of 8 carats, of a beautiful blue colour. It is said that the Duke has refused 400,000 francs for the set of Italian lace of which he was taken by the Emperor Baber at Agra; two others were buttons of Grand Turk Sultan Selim III., and were worn by Napoleon I. at the battle of Aboukir, and a tenth and eleventh were from earpendants worn by Maria Antoinette. The collection has cost 2,000,000 francs, £80,000, £12,000, £8000, and £4000.

A contract for the construction of a tunnel, extending two miles and a-half under the Mersey, from Liverpool to Birkenhead, and along with gone water, has been awarded; the lowest bid for completing the tunnel was £770,000. The work is to be completed in a tunnel of the same diameter lined with brick. The tunnel is to be excavated thirty-five feet below the bed of the Mersey, and will be 2 miles 2 furlongs 7 chains in length. It is to cover the outlet to keep out the tide. The total area of the tunnel will be twenty-seven square feet, an area amply large enough to furnish water continuously to a city five or six times the size of Chicago in the present day.

The Confederate cruiser Florida is said to have completed her repairs and alterations at Brest, and to be ready to put to sea. Her recent trial trip was most satisfactory, and she is reported to be in a high state of efficiency. Captain Maxime Richard, her new commander, has visited on the Vice-Admiral of the port and other local authorities to take official leave of them, and no doubt the Florida will sail shortly. The Semaphore, Federal steamer, has been ordered to watch the movements of the Florida, and is put forward to with considerable curiosity. Captain Richard expresses himself confident of being able to give a good account of himself and his ship and crew in the event of meeting the Federal steamer, and he is prepared to accept a contest with him outside the limits of French waters.

Mr. S. Low read the annual report of the Royal Society for the Protection of Life from Fire. It appears from this document that during the past year the number of new members added to the list of the society was 676, and the number of lives saved was seventy-four. There are now eighty-four honorary corresponding members, and seventeen died during the year.—A report has been published, containing statistics as to the number and causes of fires in London during the year 1863. A new brigade maintained at the expense of Mr. Hodges, the distiller, of Lambeth, from which it would appear that the fire was first discovered by the fireman and the men under his command. During the past year the total number of fires was 1,212, of which 1,107 occurred on the north side of the river, and 105 on the south side of the Thames. Two steam fire-engines, the Torrens and the Lambeth, were added to the service by Messrs. Hodges last year, and have proved very efficient.

On Sunday the Wesleyans of the London district commenced the celebration of the jubilee of their Foreign Missionary Society. The sums already given or promised in aid of the jubilee fund amount to £70,000, and the committee are confident that not less than £100,000 will ultimately be raised. The income of the society for the year 1863 was £107,000. The number of its institutions for the purposes of education and the training of candidates for the missionary ministry; the training and employment of a considerable number of native agents in Africa; the maintenance of numerous educational establishments in theological and biblical knowledge in Germany, France, and Italy; the translation of the Bible, and other books, into the Italian, the Canadian, the Rev. J. Fletcher at his native town of Lausanne; the sending of fifty additional missionaries to the West Indies, China, India, Africa, Australasia, and the valley of the River Yang-Tse; and the providing more fully for Christian instruction of the native converts.

Last week the births of 2010 children—1026 boys and 993 girls—were registered in London. The average number of births in the corresponding seven weeks of the years 1854-62 (the average number corrected) was 1788.—The deaths registered last week were 1,197. The average number in the corresponding seven weeks of the years 1854-62 was 1409, which, if raised in proportion to increase of population, becomes 1466. Bronchitis was the disease which occasioned the greatest mortality, 87; "fever, pure," says the Registrar-General, "were killed 14, and typhus 12; scarlatina, 11; measles, 10; small-pox, 9; diarrhœa, 8; and hooping-cough, 7. The deaths in the present week were 1,197, which, as in the corresponding weeks of the years 1854-62 was 1409, which, if raised in proportion to increase of population, becomes 1466. PRIZES OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS.

IN a recent Number we enumerated the prizes of the Royal Academy of Arts, awarded at a general assembly of the Academicians, under the presidency of Sir Charles Eastlake, held in December last. Two of the prize designs have been selected for illustration in our present Issue—one, "A Provincial Town-hall and Market-place," by Mr. Thomas Henry Watson, which gained him the travelling studentship for one year, with an allowance of £100; the other, "The Hall and Staircase of a Royal Palace," which obtained for the designer, Mr. R. Pfnesl Spiers, the gold medal.

MR. WATSON'S PRIZE DESIGN.

The annual travelling studentship of the Royal Academy, which, it is hoped, will do much for the future student of architecture in England, was inaugurated this year. Whilst the biennial travelling studentship is held by a painter or a sculptor, it is intended by the Royal Academy to offer annually a travelling studentship of one hundred pounds in the close of architecture, this new studentship lapsing, or rather being suspended, during the two years in which an architectural gold-medal student holds the biennial studentship, which was established at the foundation of the Academy in 1768, and has since then been enjoyed by the three classes of painting, sculpture, and architecture in rotation.

This prize, open to all students in architecture, is adjudged for work done in the schools of the Academy during a period of five weeks, which must consist of an original design, illustrated by three drawings, the subject being given by the council. This year "A Provincial Townhall and Market-house" was the subject selected, and we give the south-west perspective view of the successful design. The townhall, or great room, is in the front, extending over the corn-market, the townhall proper containing the various borough offices in the centre of the south front, and towards the east the borough police-station and the court of justice. The general markets extend northward, surrounded by shops for flowers, fruit, &c. The general hall for public meetings or elections opens along one side, the platform at the end forming an orchestra.

Mr. Thos. Henry Watson, M.R.I.B.A. (of whose design for an exchange we gave a view in the Number for Jan. 11, 1862), obtained three silver medals in architecture in the year 1860, the gold medal for the best architectural design in 1861, and has now obtained the travelling studentship.

MR. SPIERS'S PRIZE DESIGN.

The gold medal and a scholarship of £30 a-year for two years for the best architectural design was obtained by Mr. Richard Phené Spiers, to whom also was awarded the silver medal for the best series of figured drawings of St. Stephen's Church, Walbrook.

The subject which obtained the gold medal was "The Hall and Staircase of a Royal Palace." The design is shown on five drawings—viz., two plans, an elevation and a section of those portions of the palace which contain the staircases and staircases, and a perspective view of the staircase, which we engrave. The principal entrance to the palace is under a covered portico large enough to accommodate five carriages at a time, there being five entrance doorways to the first vestibule, on the right and left of which are waiting-rooms for the guests. This vestibule, which is comparatively plain and unpretending, about 30 ft. in height, gives access to the great hall, which is richly decorated with sculpture and gilding from top to bottom. This hall is about 50 ft. wide and nearly 100 ft. high; it is surmounted by a dome, resting on pendentives, rising from a square; the corners are filled with statues in niches, and allegorical figures. A gallery runs round the upper portion of this hall, which is lighted from the top and from twelve windows piercing the sides of the dome. On the right and left are supplementary staircases, with separate entrances, for private use by the Ministers and Diplomatic Corps. The grand staircase is entered by an archway 35 ft. wide by 52 ft. high, and is placed in a vast hall 120 ft. long by 50 ft. wide. The steps are 30 ft. wide, with three landings, the centre one wider than the others, and having two exedræ, or resting-places. At a distance of eight or ten feet from the wall is a balustrade, the space between which and the wall is to be filled with flowers and shrubs. On the first floor a gallery passes on each side of the staircase, and is separated from it by a range of columns 25 ft. high. This colonnade forms the chief decoration of the staircase-hall. It is surrounded by a cornice and a coved ceiling pierced with windows, between which are placed winged angels bearing crowns, palm-branches, &c. The upper portion of the ceiling is enriched by paintings. This staircase leads to the antechamber of the throne-room, whence those about to be presented file through rooms on the left to await their turn, all those who have the entire entering the throne-room at once.

ROYAL ACADEMY PRIZE DRAWING: "STAIRCASE OF A ROYAL PALACE," BY MR. RICHARD PHENE SPIERS.

PALMERSTON CHURCH, NEAR DUBLIN.

PALMERSTON, IN THE COUNTY OF DUBLIN.

THE village of Palmerston is situated upon the south bank of the river Liffey, in the county of Dublin, at a distance of about four miles from Dublin city. It has been the residence of more than one noted man. In 1606 the famous Sir John Temple Knight passed patent for Palmerston, 912 acres statute measure; and from this locality the present Premier, Sir Henry John Temple, K.G., Viscount Palmerston, of Palmerston, in the county of Dublin, derives his title. Of the ancient village the church only remains. It is an ante-Norman structure, consisting of nave and chancel, the former measuring 10 yds. by 5 yds.; the latter, 4½ yds. by 3½ yds. The chancel arch is semicircular, and its sides are inclined—a peculiarity indicative of very high antiquity when found in Irish ecclesiastical remains. The doorway, which is now stopped up, was placed, as usual, in the centre of the west gable. It is square-headed, like the doorways of many of the celebrated round towers of Ireland, and its sides also incline. The windows, which are of the lancet form, appear to have been remodelled at the close of the twelfth or beginning of the thirteenth century.

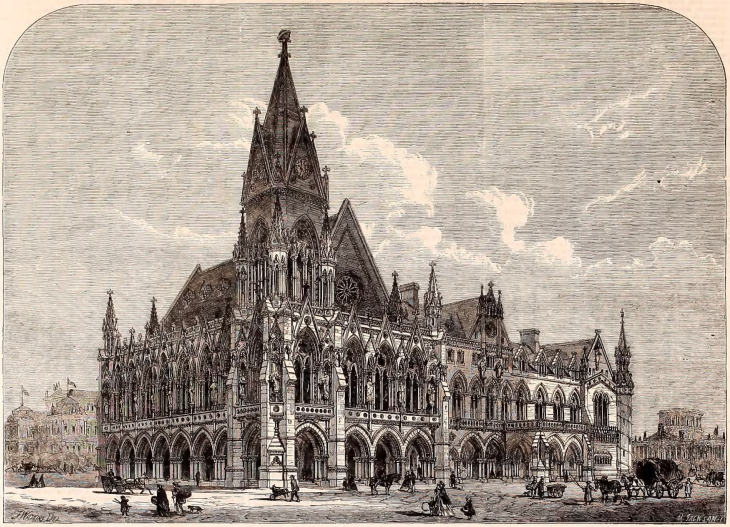
Adjoining the church, a few yards to the south-eastward, stands a venerable yew-tree, now almost withered, and which has probably given name to the place. In Ireland, the yew-tree is almost invariably styled "palm," and on Palm Sunday the Roman Catholics, men and women, usually attach a sprig of the yew to their hats or bonnets. That this tree is coeval with the church there can be little doubt; and, as the latter exhibits the architectural peculiarities of a period certainly not later than the twelfth century, the Palmerston yew must be considered as one of the oldest trees remaining in the country.

The first Lord Palmerston, great-grandfather of the present Lord, still held the old seat of the Temples at Palmerston in 1754; but probably the family removed to Broadlands, Hants, at the first Peer's death, in 1757. Certain it is that not many years after that the Right Hon. John Hely Hutchinson, the statesman, and ancestor of the present Earl of Donoughmore, came into possession of the Palmerston estate, and built a handsome new mansion upon it, now the seat of his descendant, the Earl of Donoughmore.

The graveyard at Palmerston contains a ruined mausoleum which is supposed to have been the burial-place of many of the ancestors of Lord Palmerston, but no inscription remains. The only headstone of any interest now to be seen in this thickly-peopled cemetery is a record of John Perrin, Esq., of Leinster Lodge, father of the present venerable Judge Perrin.

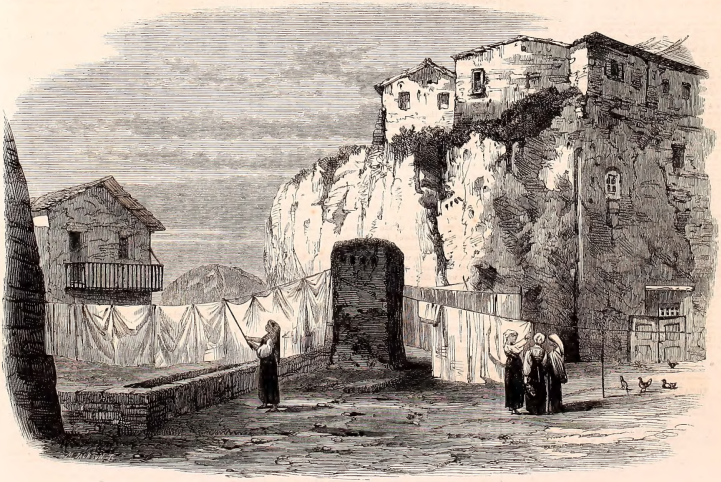
Our Engraving of the ruined church (a view from the north-west) and the yew-tree at Palmerston are from sketches by Mr. Wakeman, of Newton Hall, Black Rock, Dublin.

THE TARPEIAN ROCK,



ON proceeding from the modern portion of Rome towards the Capitol, the traveller is sure to be assailed by a troop of little beggars, who offer to conduct him to the Rupps Tarpeia, or Tarpeian Rock. The way to it lies through a vegetable garden, and, should the surprised traveller ask the ragged merchants for information respecting the rock, they are sure to reply that it is there, but that it no longer exists, things having changed considerably since that period, without indicating the "precise time when" by the vague expressions.

The topographical disposition of the spot scarcely induces the visitor to imagine that he is standing upon the rock itself. Nevertheless, if, instead of going up directly to the Capitol, the traveller should follow a narrow passage along the base of the Mount Capitolinus he will meet with an abrupt lane leading upwards to the Capitol, but, in reality, barred by the rock itself, which rises up in front, and is partly covered by some old houses which prevent it from being seen from the gardens above. These houses replace the high wall that formerly surmounted the rock.



As regards the name given to this famous rock, it will be remembered that Tarpeia, daughter of Tarpeius, governor of the Capitol under Romulus, offered to deliver this place to Tatius, a Sabine General, on condition that his soldiers should give her what they wore on their left arms, thereby designating their golden bracelets. Tatius, already master of the fortress, threw upon Tarpeia his bracelet and his shield, which he also had upon his left arm; and, being initiated by his soldiers in this action, Tarpeia was crushed under the weight of the brazen shields, in the year 746 B.C. The unfortunate Tarpeia was buried in the mountain, which has ever since borne the name of the Tarpeian Rock, and which became, afterwards, the spot whence traitors to their country were hurled to destruction. The incline that crosses the lane has been formed by rubbish thrown during several ages from the summit of the rock, which thus appears to have diminished greatly, more than forty feet of detritus having been at different times deposited at its base.

This locality of sinister recollections is now only frequented by washer-women, who peacefully spread out their linen to dry on the spot where, as recorded by Titus Livius and other early historians, numbers of more or less celebrated Romans met with a traitor's death by being precipitated from the Tarpeian Rock.

Manlius Capitolinus, who defended the Capitol against the attack of the Gauls, was among the most recently. Having been accused of treason and punished with this ignominious death, B.C. 370; and four centuries later (A.D. 68) the Emperor Galba was put to the same end to which the sentence of his judges had condemned him, by suicide.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1864.

We had intended to recur to the subject of the Shakspeare Commemoration until some demonstration should have been made by the London committee. But, in the absence of any topic of greater interest (we except, of course, the conjecture of a Dano-German war, a theme which has been argued out, and in reference to which we have nothing to add), and in the presence of an important movement in connection with the Shakspearean memorial, we do not feel that the subject is one on which the people of "the Three Kingdoms and the Fifty Colonies" will be unwilling to receive a few additional remarks. The great name of Shakspeare, however unworthily it has been used, will always accredit the writer who avails himself of it for a befitting purpose. It is more worthy of honour than the endeavour to prevent discredit from being thrown upon the character of the admiration in which England holds the noblest of her poets.

It has been suggested that ere this the promoters of the scheme for celebrating the three hundredth anniversary of the birth of Shakespeare would have called together a public meeting to consider the best mode of carrying out their views. Only ninety days are now between us and the day in question. Yet we know nothing at all as to what is to be done or attempted. But we learn from non-official reports that meetings of general and special committees have been held, that great discord has prevailed, that proceedings of the executive have been condemned by a small majority, which would have been a large one but for the votes of some twelve secretaries who ought not to have voted on a question affecting their own acts. That the presence of a learned and popular Archbishop, and his special representations of the desirability of peace, merely prevented verbal outbreak of censure, and that on a vote upon the most important question that has arisen since the committee's first met, the result induced a large number of gentlemen to leave the room, with the intention of not returning. All this promised badly enough for the success of the Shakspearean movement.

But a still more damaging "situation" has resulted. The country has been addressed upon the subject of the memorial, and has responded. Subscriptions have been sent in. Nine gentlemen known to the public have announced their withdrawal from the committee, and have, in a temperate and business-like manner, stated their reasons for declining further co-operation. And, finally, the Mayor has convened, to-day, a meeting of the Corporation, to consider a letter from Mr. Halliwell, which he has received from those who have undertaken to carry out the memorial should he, and the advice as to its site; that this report, so rational that it is impossible to conceive the arriving at any other decision, was presented to the general committee, was received with applause, was by a majority of votes adopted, was minuted, and that a majority in the committee then proceeded to stultify the last vote by sanctioning an immediate address to the public, and demanded for the purpose of this address the gentlemen who have withdrawn conclude by saying that no undertaking so conducted can prosper, and they predict a failure of the scheme, and a bringing down of universal contempt upon the whole profession of literature. Such a statement as this advice appeared in all the London daily newspapers simultaneously, and was accompanied, or has been followed, by the unhesitating approbation of the journals. The example of the writers will, it is declared, be largely followed.

At this moment, therefore, the condition of the business is about as bad as it can well be, though precedents entitle us to believe that this almost impossible state of affairs is attractive in doing the wrong thing. The best course which could be taken would be a graceful abandonment or postponement of the memorial notion, and a resolution to keep the day as pleasantly as possible, leaving the duty of Shakspeare to take care of itself, as it has done with some success for about two hundred and fifty years. If the executive will not permit the committee (which is sensibly helpless and obedient), except when a sudden fit of indignation comes upon it, as when insult is offered to a great man or dictation is carried a little too far) to take this course, the next best thing is to let the committee commit suicide, and, indeed, if they please, to transfer their names to the Stratford list. The birthplace of the poet, the place of his retirement and of his grave, has all the associations which are lacked by the scene of his little-known life of activity. And the Stratford committee have acted in a spirit becoming the pupils of the largest-hearted of men. We have heard of no wranglings; and the only occasion on which Stratford has been for a moment placed in an antagonistic attitude was when the Chief Magistrate, who has worked so well for the cause, was rudely and personally assailed in letters from the London executive. If those who have no desire to be aiders and abettors in a ludicrous failure withdraw from the London list, it will be left to those who have such ambition to obey the directions of their executive, and to march bedizened with whatever ribbons the latter may select, to whatever spot they may think a desirable one for spendifying in detriment to the memory of the last person who seems to be considered in the matter. But we still hope for a more pleasant and rational termination to the business, and all depends upon the course which the executive may please to take. If the memorial be abandoned or postponed, the 23rd of April may be an agreeable Shakspearean fête day; if obstinacy prevail, the 24th of April will hear the beginning of a laughing chorus whose echoes will reverberate all over Europe and America.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

The great metropolis is being rapidly eclipsed by Liverpool in the art of doing things on a large scale. A very recently-raised punishment was displayed in Liverpool on a scale most sickening, compared with any London experience of the new generation. The great maritime town also monopolised a lion's share of the earthquake shock; and now it has been the scene of a gunpowder explosion of sufficient dimensions to have answered every purpose of Mr. Guido Fawkes. The affair is not to the credit of the police force. Fire flames were aboard the Lottie Sleigh. It would be as well to know who is responsible for the crime of dangerous a thing as gunpowder on board a vessel whilst powder was being shipped, or, indeed, at any time. Did nobody smoke a pipe? Did nobody meet grocers, or sinking the ship by means of well-directed artillery? of very large size in the river, or incautiously carry about with him a half tons of gunpowder overboard? Fortunately, the Mersey at Liverpool is broader river than the Thames at London Bridge, and therefore the damage done to the shipping is not so great. Be it sufficient to state that the authorities should remove the powder-station considerably further down stream. A ton of gunpowder or so of powder is allowed within many miles of London; but, if it were, the same accident would have happened. Had the ton of powder "only" would have laid down its load very meekly, and possibly have crossed the river without touching the bottom. The Old Custom House and the White Tower might have been a heap of ruins, and the new railway bridge might have been blown away to mean thoroughfares many parishes off. As for the dome of St. Paul's, it might have soared, and finally settled itself in a commanding position to Rowland Hill's Surrey Chapel; and, as Fuller says of "the pyramids, doting with age," the many dome might have been said to have "outdated the Fire, might "have forgotten the name of their founder" through dizziness encountered in being shaken to their very foundations.

The Garrick Club has, indirectly, called to mind that an ancient scheme of street nomenclature, calculated alike to give ease to all people and honour to few. We have Shakspeare's name on the Works that King-street, Covent-garden, now carrying prolific past Mr. Allen's cover, leading for the Garrick Theatre, and, by future, be called Garrick-street. This is a good idea, or, rather, a good piece of remembrance; but there is a better idea than it. A common as crocuses in March, or mince-pies at an earlier and later period of the year. A good actor should have a statue, an epigram, and capable of being mastered as easily as "eyes" or "ices." But the name of a street is a more lasting memory of somebody; but the most enthusiastic and loyal devotion of landlords could scarcely manage to call out our Kings and their streets in accurate succession. Mr. Thackeray himself could not have succeeded all the way from George-streets named after the four Georges; and who is to know, when Queen Victoria is dead and Charles street, whether he be assisting to worship the blessed memory of the first or the second of those kindly-remembered men of the land? And so, years ago, it was hailed as a politic scheme to set such matters at rest. Every plan was to be carried out in order of the muse. All the distinguished names of men and things were enlisted in their ideal. Lamb and Lawrence-lanes were to cover their Irving heads best, understood that they were to be knocked-down with street, Sheridan-square was appointed to buildings, or whatsoever description a builder or proprietor might be pleased to give. But the idea has long since been considered a dead, although it is well worth prosecution, and might be adopted by degrees on common suggestion. The Garrick Club proposal has been referred to a select department of the board.

The storm has over (though not without wrecks) amongst the National Shakespeare Committee. The Bard is to have his statue and readings at Stratford-on-Avon. "There," says the Rev. Mr. J. M. Rhiley, organising secretary for the Committee, "there he was born, there he lived and died, and there his ashes rest." There, indeed, he was. But Shakspeare's memory is connected more tangible than "honourable mention," as Royal Commissioners style the Shakspeare description of it. Shakspeare is accordingly the local committee has decided upon a six days' celebration of his advent to Stratford-on-Avon, by the performance of plays like the festival held for three days in September, 1769. The first day, Saturday, the 23rd of April, the anniversary of the Bard's death, they will lay the first stone of a monument at present un-described, to Shakspeare. The first day's play will be Hamlet, at which will assist the rank and fashion of "surrounding counties," although nothing has yet been said about the constant contribution, by voluntary contributions, the chance of Stratford Church. Prince Shakspeare's Day will be a day of musical, and many of England's best musicians have already volunteered for the service. The next day will be a fête, the grand day of the Shakspearean scenes, with various slender amusements, and a comedy "next popular Cymbeline," by the same hand. Monday and Tuesday there are to be readings and other amusements, with Hamlet performed in the best available manner for the Bard of Avon. For the last day, a fancy ball will take place, Shakspearean costumes of all events Shakspeare, being the order of the day. The committee is building a very large temporary hall for these various occasions, and there seems every reason why they need be restrained from spending at least one day in festivity devoted to the memory of England's greatest poet. The arrangements seem good—not riotously mirthful, but calm and sensible.

Since last week's gossip was followed. The entertainments were limited to three days then, but the committee have added a fourth. A new building was raised, and the banks of the Avon were adorned with transparencies representing "Time breaking a scythe in pieces," a "Tragedy" and "Comedy," personified, playing no mean part in the colouring. The festival began with a grand ball on the first evening, then a dinner (a dinner in honour of the poet having since become a thing of well-known institution at the Shakspeare Club) then more music, and a ball. Next day Mr. Boswell has to report that a magnificent pageant closed the day, and a procession of the stormy weather, fine clothes being too valuable to be spoiled; but it is hoped, as they say that the rain will produce the whole affair at Drury Lane, which, like our modern Orpheus, "draws all wet or dry." Then follows recipe on recipe, there is plenty more music, a stupid local song, races, and a fancy ball. Wednesday, the last day, wakes no difference in the views of the society regarding a celebration which is to meet the views of the Bard's fellow-men. Conservatives will find what they propose to do now—work special to be developed to be everybody's work in the future.

West Indian landowners may be congratulated on some good news, via Mr. James Hall, for handwriting a bill to compensate, not the most parts of the world the rule is to find men without land, but in our Atlantic colonies the rule is to find land without the men to owners. Ever since the exertions of Clarkson and Wilberforce, various similar projects have been set on foot, the principle the theory being that black labour was indispensable, and that the black race would not work unless they had to. Mr. Carlyle's ideas about "Quashee and his inexhaustible pumpkin," the point of which is that Quashee is a lazy fellow because he can get any amount of black labour by the simple process of paying for it, and that he is happy without work, he affirms that even the fair sex, as coloured ladies must still be called, are to be had for the asking, and that Quashee's wife requires in order to procure a different silk gown for every day in the week. Political economy and free economists can answer, counsel such extravagance, it must at least be admitted better than the simple theory of negro indolence and of women of mixed native blood ladies in their native land. It cotton will grow in these regions, then West Indian proprietors must be congratulated. If the American war lasts much longer there will surely be cotton all over the world, just as there is wool all over a sheep's back. The reader may remember a little book by Major Hubert Bray Hall, called "The Oyster, and How to Eat Him." In that manual of bivalvian gastronomy the favourite shellfish is treated with an effective astounding to absolute petting, and the endearing process goes on until—the oyster is eaten! The Major has found a worthy conquest in Mr. Crofts, a gentleman who has turned his attention, in more ways than one, to this valuable kind of food—valuable, because, so light and nutritious that no invalid was ever known to be so invalided as to be unable to eat it. Mr. Crofts has organised an Oyster Company, the object of which is to purchase beds on the north Kentish coast for the purpose of laying out oyster-beds on scientific principles, and preserving the "spat" (young or spawn) from the devastating effects of the fishermen's cruel dredge. Years since, in another and a less favourable locality, a similar scheme returned a profit of no less than fifty per cent; and the Duke of Northumberland has a bed of his own at Blyth. This is a new branch of industry, and one worthy all public encouragement. As a lover of the oyster, plain, fried, roasted, stewed, or devilled, he sighed to find the price this last season nearly double that of two years before, and the sooner our good spirits rise at a return to old familiar prices the better. Mr. Crofts's scheme may benefit both and pocket. Mr. Crofts's science may possibly accelerate the desired result.

His Lordship, in the course of a very interesting address, stated that the circumstances which had led to the establishment of the Anglican Church at Madagascar, and expressed his great desire to further the spread of the Gospel there in connection with the Church of England. On the following day the Bishop spoke in high terms of Mr. Ellis, the Nonconformist missionary, and his mission at Madagascar, and stated that, as the Church of England Mission might be able to bring all her great powers to bear on so interesting and promising a field, success must follow.

Counter have been entered into for the erection, at an expense of about £80,000, of a college, which, when completed, will be one of the greatest of the many ornaments of the metropolis. The site is in Gower-street, and the building and endowment are bequeathed by the late Sir William Fetter, who died in 1838, in his will dated 1836, and proved in the following year. Sir William Fetter, which, after the payment of certain annuities and legacies, will amount to £160,000. Since 1838 the fund has increased from £100,000 to £160,000 by the accumulation of interest and the rise in the value of property. Mr. Barry is the architect and designer of the testator. The site of the new building, which will be surrounded by a spacious area, is in Gower-street, Bedford-square. It is to be entered from the south, and is in a very picturesque vicinity. The trustees have resolved that the college shall be called "The Fetter College." The object of the donations of persons who have either died without having sufficient funds, or who, having had sufficient funds, have become reduced in circumstances after their children a liberal education. It is intended to admit pupils (on payment of fees), who shall attend the usual classes at the London University. The course of education is to include the ancient and modern languages, mathematics, and such branches of scientific and artistic instruction as the trustees may direct. Those who have distinguished themselves in their studies are to receive as the foundation. The trustees are empowered to institute two "exhibitions" of the annual value of £50, tenable for four years, to the University of Edinburgh. The trustees are also to found two scholarships in the University of Dublin, one for graduates in arts of the University of Edinburgh, who have been educated at the Fetter College.

It is proposed to erect a statue to Bernard Palissy, the famous worker in pottery, at Saintes (Charente-Inférieure), his birthplace.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

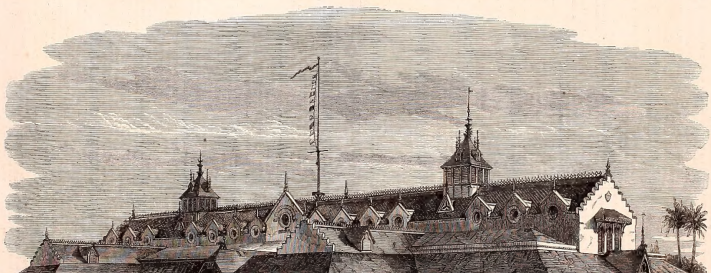
SPONTANEOUS GENERATIONS.—At a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, M. Pasteur spoke at length on his discovery on this subject. In his recent memoir he stated, on the faith of experiments, that it was always possible to take away from any determined spot a limited, yet notable, amount of air which has not undergone any physical or chemical change, and which was, nevertheless, quite unable to provoke any alteration in an eminently putrescible liquid. MM. Pouchet and Joly have since affirmed that this result was erroneous, and have defied them to prove it so. MM. Joly and Musset said, "If a single one of our tubes of experiment should be found to contain organisms, we defeat," and M. Pouchet also said, "I declare that in the globe wherein I shall take a definite decimetre of air, when I shall have filled it with the liquid which I employ, I shall not find a single organism, but I shall have filled it with living organisms." In conformity with the demand of MM. Pouchet, Joly, and Musset, the Academy of Sciences, at its meeting on Monday, appointed a committee composed of several of its most illustrious members—M.M. Flourens, Dumas, Decaisne, Milne Edwards, and Brongniart—to repair to the spot, to the experiments, the results of which have been invoked as either favourable or contrary to the theory of spontaneous generation.

THE FIRST ANALYSIS OF 177 MAGNETIC STORMS, recently laid before the Royal Society by Commander Ross, R.N., and Mr. Lefroy, is printed in the new number (39) of the Proceedings of the society. In regard to the physical theory of these disturbances, the author remarks that conclusions drawn from tables exhibiting the algebraic sum of fluctuations for each storm, the magnitude of which is not taken into account, are extremely liable to misconstruction, and that the results of travelling forces would represent to a being over whom they travelled, to the simultaneous observations made at three or six observatories spread over Europe, and the consequent conclusion that a wave-like movement travelled from observatory to observatory, and that the adjustments of the light give sufficient strength to the frame to enable the observer to read the instruments with perfect ease.

GEOLOGY OF ESSEX AND SUFFOLK.—At a recent meeting of the Geological Society, Mr. J. Prestwich, F.R.S., read, 1st, a paper relative to a tabulated description of about fifty sections taken from various parts of the Red Crag district. The Red Crag consists of a series of shelly sands strictly divisible into five stages, of which the first four, counting upwards, are marine, and the fifth estuarine. In addition to their being regularly stratified, the angles varying between 25 deg. and 30 deg., and possessing (with the exception of the fifth stage) a general northerly dip, they are characterised by the result of a general northerly dip; by which was formed a reef extending from the River Alde, on the coast of Suffolk, to the neighbourhood of Harwich, on the coast of Essex. The author described and interpreted the first, second, and third being frequently either concealed by or disturbed by the formation of the overlying deposits. The fourth stage, which is also the age of the four lower stages contain evidence of being a subaqueous deposit, but not a very deep one; but in the case of the first reef-range, and those again by the fifth stage. The fifth stage is invariably found resting unconformably upon the four lower and older strata. This stage is developed in such a way as to show that it was formed in estuaries, and that it is, as it is in the case of the Red Crag, separated by a long interval from the Coralline Crag. Underlying into the sands and gravels, termed by Mr. Wood the Lower Drift, and the Red Crag, and the drift-sands. other places it rests upon the London clay, the Chalk, the Lias and the drift-sands.

THE SOURCES OF THE NILE.—With reference to Captain Speke's statement that he had received information from the Arabs of a large river flowing from the Victoria Nyanza to the north, Mr. Petherick, the well-known traveller in Central Africa, a correspondent (signing C. C. B.) has sent us a transcript of Ptolemy's description of the Nile, in which he says that "Ptolemy, at different times takes a number of the Nile, and as being supplied by streams issuing from Mentet Lunæ and from Montes Asyptor from the Mountains of the Moon. Ptolemy also mentions a lake Coloe, which appears some distance south of the Equinoctiale Circulus, and which, from the position and outline map of the ancient country are doubtless in existence) the comparison of the ideas of the geographers of the period with the facts of modern discovery, is a curious study to the student of modern discovery.

THE INTENSITY OF THE SOLAR RADIATION at different seasons of the year has been investigated by Father Secchi, of the Observatory at Rome. The results are given in a memoir read before the end of last year, of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, before the Academy of Sciences at Paris, before the Academy of Sciences at Paris, before



THE WAR IN AMERICA: FORT FISHER, COMMANDING THE NEW INLET ENTRANCE TO CAPE FEAR RIVER.—THE BRITISH STEAMER HANSA RUNNING THE BLOCKADE UNDER THE GUNS OF THE FORT.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE WAR IN AMERICA.

OUR Special Artist in the South writes as follows concerning the accompanying Illustration:—"Herewith I send you a sketch of Fort Fisher, commanding the approach to Cape Fear River, the entrance to Wilmington, North Carolina. I was down there one night, and, as it is twenty-five miles from the town, it was impossible to get back that night, so I had to rough it in a casemate till morning. At first I would have it, we discovered a blockade-running steamer, the Hansa, under our guns at dawn, and at the same time the Yankee blockaders also became aware of her presence and opened fire, thinking, as she had already got inside the bar (the line of white breakers just seaward of her), they would destroy her before she made the inlet. To get within range they had to expose themselves to the metal of the fort, which soon drove them off, leaving the Hansa at liberty to make her way safely into the river. The distant point of land is Cape Fear. Fort Fisher is one of the strongest coast defences I have seen, not excepting any of those at Charleston, that have hitherto held an entire iron-clad fleet at bay."

THE PUNJAUB EXHIBITION AT LAHORE.

AN exhibition of the products, manufactures, and arts of the Punjaub is about to be held at Lahore, and the secretary of the exhibition committee has obligingly forwarded to us a photograph of the building, from which we give, at page 77, an Engraving. The building is of brickwork, 251ft. long, with a nave 70ft. wide; and two side aisles, each 18ft. wide; with two small annexes (projecting in the Engraving), 30ft. by 20ft. each. There will also be a temporary annexe in the rear for carriage, machinery, &c. In this latter it is also proposed to exhibit the processes of several of the most celebrated of the Punjaub manufactures, by having men actually at work at their respective trades, such as shawl embroidery work, wire-drawing, gold and silver brocade work (from Delhi), and gujerati-work (steel inlaid with gold, which was much admired at the exhibition of '62).

THE PUNJAUB EXHIBITION BUILDING AT LAHORE.

The building was only begun in June, and it was expected that it would be finished in December and opened this month. The verandah, of which only the framework is shown in the Engraving, will be tiled, and the interior coloured. Mr. Baines, C.E., of the Punjaub Railway, is the architect.

"DRINK TO ME ONLY WITH THINE EYES."

OUR critical remarks upon the picture engraved on the next page will be found in their appropriate place—the review of the Winter Exhibition of Oil Paintings, at 121, Pall-mall, in our Number for the 14th of November of last year. The picture is certainly the most attractive among the figure works painted expressly for this exhibition, and has deservedly had awarded to it the prize of 100 guineas offered by Mr. Wallis, the enterprising picture dealer and promoter of the exhibition, for the best work answering the requirements just mentioned. The artist, Mr. Calderon, is one of the most genuine and promising of the painters who have recently risen into public favour. It will now, not, perhaps, be deemed superfluous to repeat the descriptive portion of our previous notice. But first, the famous Anacreontic by rare old Ben Jonson, which the picture illustrates, will be acceptable. The song is the ninth piece in "The Forest," and is addressed to Celia:—

Drink to me only with thine eyes,
And I will pledge with mine;
Or leave a kiss but in the cup,
And I'll not look for wine.
The thirst that from the soul doth rise,
Doth ask a drink divine:
But might I of Jove's nectar sup,
I would not change for thine.

I sent thee late a rosy wreath,
Not so much honouring thee,
As giving it a hope that there
It could not wither'd be.
But thou thereon didst only breathe,
And sent'st it back to me:
Since when it grows, and smells, I swear,
Not of itself, but thee.

The song, it must be confessed, has some trace of the artificial extravagance not unfrequently found in the sixteenth and seventeenth century poetry interwoven with its glorious richness and passion. There is a slow, sweet, but cloying melody (that might, and has, we believe, served for a psalm tune), to which the song is still sung, and this may have rendered it some widely known than its intrinsic merit deserved.

We have already hinted that the expressions of the figures in the picture have an abundance quite equal to the luxurious warmth that nourishes in the song. The painter has also caught the model's bore-sick fancy. "Drink to me only with thine eyes" and has carried it out not merely literally, by representing the winecup standing quite unheeded beside the lady, but has followed up this idea by introducing the attendant carrying away from the table—full of wine—a cup to spread with the same delicious wine which is consumed, and, from the pastures of the fat cook, one may suspect has been returned untouched. Possibly it may have been some chief dainty of her art, and, in his astonishment and disgust are, therefore, proportionate. The loving, languishing delight of the lady and the listless air of her lazy husband and lover has already been commented upon. A late, suggesting an accommodating lazy, to the left, and a page, with clasped hands. We have already inferred from the costumes—the train of the lady, and the long beard and the "Dives" costume of the host, the heraldic devices and motto "Dieu et sa dame," on the back of the chair, and the whole scheme of the picture, that the painter intended to represent a Norman baron and his lady-love.

The picture has been engraved by permission of the purchaser, A. J. Iverston, Esq.

FINE ARTS.

THE SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

SEVERAL important additions to and rearrangements in the South Kensington Museum have recently been or are now being made; some elaborate decorations are being executed, and another and a new gallery will be shortly opened to the public.

In the Sheepshanks Gallery the Lely Collection was exhibited last year, an immense number of objects of ornamental art of various periods are still on view, but in no such manner or proportion as previously. This handsome court is, however, designed ultimately to contain examples illustrative of the successive styles of ornamental art of the various modern art-manufactures. In conformity with this intention, a complete set of engravings of the series of paintings in Pompeii china, dating from the commencement of the manufactory to the present time (lent by Messrs. Bunn and Kerr), has been placed in case to the extent of the cornice. Some one description the colour-decoration of the court has been begun, and already the north end of the court of Wedgwood and Minton ware, with Gothic Gilding and the primary colours preponderate—at least in the proportions of the Gothic. The effect is good, and that the decorative is are generally subordinated to the constructive. On the west side the Gothic Court, designed by Mr. George Godfrey Sykes, the decorator. This gentleman, who is also a clever artist, has painted on the walls of the Gothic Court, which now occupy six of the ten blind compartments of the upper arcade on the east side of the court, figures of the Queen, and eminent men of the Victorian era. Of these, by Mr. Frederick Leighton (the old Italian painter is represented reading patent-office reports), and especially to whom the letter reminding us of this artist's great picture, "The Procession of Canadian," "Albert Durer," by Mr. Cave Thomas; "Hogarth," by Mr. Alfred Elmore, R.A.; "Sir Joshua Reynolds," and "William of Wykeham," by Mr. Burchett, Head Master of the South Kensington School. The portrait of Hogarth is from the picture which has undertaken "Gilberti," and we believe Mr. Leighton has promised "Raphael," "Michael Angelo," "Titian," "Rubens," "Vandyke," "Flaxman" and "Holbein." The two last are understood to be promised conditionally on the completion by the artist of the time he may have to execute them from his duties in the museum. The figures are painted on a gold ground, in conformity with the general scheme, and it is intended that they shall ultimately be executed in mosaic. In the cloister-like space between the arcade and the wall of the north court, to contain art-objects of Oriental origin, is being decorated after rich and elaborate designs in a kind of Arabo-Chinese style by Mr. Owen Jones. The designs will be copied on the walls by pupils of the neighbouring art-schools. The large lunette at the head of the decorated space will contain a picture in fresco, also by pupils of the water-glass, by Mr. Watts. The sketch for this work is, we understand, finished and ready for execution.

The great north court, which in an unfinished state was temporarily roofed with corrugated iron, and the building known as the Refreshment Rooms, after a closure of some months, been fitted, decorated, and reopened. The entire north court is now roofed in with glass, resembling the cortile of an Italian palace, is intended to receive large monumental sculptures and architectural casts. It is also to be supplied with mediæval casts which cannot find a place elsewhere. The tribune or chapel of Santa Croce in Jerusalem, the interior of the tomb, and the sharpcore of the chapel has been erected against a side wall. Here are placed, among multifarious objects, the tomb of Pope Sixtus IV., the sepulchre in classic sculptures and casts thereof, architectural ornaments, models of buildings, imitations or specimens of ancient mosaic and other works of art. Over the arches, in lofty panels, are paintings and arabesques illustrative of the Raphael period, furniture, &c. carvings. The frescoes will be copied on the walls by pupils of the neighbouring art-schools. The frescoes will be copied on the walls by pupils of the Thorwaldsen's great frieze, "The Triumph of Alexander." The old flute and other mediæval carvings are very curious and will be very suggestive to the novelist, historian, and historical painter. Two old Italian chairs are also lent by Mr. Webb. The Gothic Court of the Hobbs ware is now arranged together in a new north-east wing of this court. There may be seen the terra-cotta of Andrea Sansovino, the rosettes of the year, purchased from the Campagna Collection; and an enormous portion of the original cartoon for Raphael's great picture in the wall of a building.

The new room beneath the recently-erected schools of the department will shortly be opened with splendid collections of tapestries, embroidered vestments, and textile fabrics, ironwork of all periods, and pottery. It is to contain specimens of Italian, Spanish, &c., in great variety; and the textile fabrics, which are of all kinds, include a series, perhaps the most complete in existence, ranging from the eleventh to the sixteenth century, collected by Dr. Bock, of Aix-la-Chapelle. The windows will be filled with stained glass, the stained-glass works sent in for the forthcoming competition in the spring.

Since our notice of the schools their appointments have been made complete, and a collection of engravings, and of photographs, &c., consisting, for the most part, of duplicates from the Museum, has been placed in them for the purpose of study by the artists' properties" in the studios.

The very valuable collections of casts from Gothic sculptures belonging to the Architectural Museum and the Art Department have been re-arranged in a more convenient manner; and to these are to be added a number of casts of the most beautiful sculptures from the Bury during his building of the Westminster Palace, and which have lately come into the possession of the Museum. Some of these casts are at South Kensington are three taken from the famous bronze doors of the Baptistery of San Giovanni, at Florence, by Lorenzo Ghiberti, and the other two by Ghiberti. All plaster casts of works in bronze, however, unsatisfactory; they are what is technically called "gummy", and do not preserve the sharpness of the final workmanship. The Department of the Museum, to which these casts belong, we are glad to add, have obtained permission to procure electrotype copies from the great doors mentioned, and orders have been given to take them. Similar electrotype facsimiles are likewise being made for the museum of the bronze gates of the Church of Pisa, which were modelled from designs by Giovanni di Bologna. The bronze is now at this capital (the old name of the city is still retained amongst the artists), and which dates from the twelfth century) is also included, and has already been copied.

We have on former occasions alluded to the large but not complete collection of wood engravings; and also to the specimens of the workmanship sent in competition for the Society of Arts' prizes. Both these will be found in the large room from which the visitor enters the picture galleries. Passing through the Sheepshanks Gallery, and another extremity, a very elegant, new gallery, constructed upon Mr. Redgrave's principle of lighting and on the model of that erected during this gentleman's designs, is very nearly completed. The walls are painted in sober green and dispersed, the columns are in imitation coloured marble; the mouldings, &c., are coloured and gilt; and the whole has a very chaste, agreeable effect. The walls of this gallery, which are divided into a series of bays, with semicircular, moulded heads, will receive the best consecutive drawings produced in the metropolitan or provincial schools. The lunettes over these divisions may (as an incentive to distinguish themselves) be decorated by the successful students in fresco-painting, or even exhibited beneath.

A picture is on view at Messrs. Lloyd Brothers, Gracechurch-street, which deserves a closer inspection than could be given to it when in the Royal Academy exhibition of last year, owing to the height at which it was then placed, on the line on which (by H. L. Roberts) who, we understand, is still very young, it is not a little remarkable. The subject is taken from the poem of Keats, and traces in it of technical immaturity. The picture resembles a retable, or ornamental screen, behind the altar of some mediæval church, and illustrates the parable of the sower. In the first division, the cold, grey rock, on which the seed has fallen, is represented. The sower has already scattering the seed among the furrows; some have fallen (in the second division) by the wayside, and the birds are picking up and ominous birds of prey," as Poe calls them, and have standing for the devil, as they have always been, the symbol of evil. Behind is a old man and a child, typifying human sentiments and harvest, are seen in the distance, and, in the second division the sun's meridian rays are scorchingly on a dry, bare tract, strewn with chalk-stones, or with rocks cropping up through the thin soil, and here and there a drooping, withered plant, which has sprung hastily from the shallow earth. Next, there are a few sickly, stunted wheat-shafts choked amidst a tangle of weeds, and, in the fourth division, the corn is ripening, with the gaudy poppy, and other emblematical flowers, poisonous weeds, and fruit-bearing plants. The sower has changed into a husbandman; while overhead thunder-clouds, tinged with the blood-red hues of an angry sunset, seem to portend a storm. In the fifth division, we have the black pall of death. In the last compartment the tall, golden wheat stands thick on the ground, ready for the sickle.

The newly-formed second gallery of pictures of the French school of the nineteenth century, which, we understand, is intended ultimately to be exhibited there, are Watteau, Boucher, Nattier, Vanloo, Pater, Lancret, Greuze, Vernet, Gros, Gericault, Ingres, Delacroix, Delille, Mayer; Proudhon, Coypel, Lemoyne, and Charles and Joseph Vernet.

A large and handsome palace is being built at Darmstadt for Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, by the style of the architecture is Italian, of more than ordinary purity.

Mr. Hodson, of Cockspur-street, a picture representing the scene on London Bridge on the night of the illuminations in honour of the Prince of Wales's visit to the City. This picture, entitled "Homeward," "The Finding of the Saviour in the Temple," is now on view at the Academy Exhibition.

In our notice last week of the tomb of James Ward, R.A., we inadvertently smoked that Mr. Ward was a native of Somerset, and Mr. Moxland. This is incorrect: it was Mr. William Ward. A.R.A., one of the engravers to the Queen, who was a native of Somerset. James Ward was appointed as an engraver, who married the lady mentioned.

The Pope, as a Christmas gift to Prince Rudolphe, son of the Emperor of Austria, has sent to the Archduchess Sophie a picture whose the value of the present by writing in it is sentence from the Bible.

The Polish National Government has addressed a proclamation to its troops, dated Dec. 16. It is a strong exhortation to courage and perseverance, and ends with the words, "Soldiers! THE HOUSE, AT DHURUMSALLA, IN WHICH THE EARL OF ELGIN, GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA, DIED.

PLACE OF DEATH AND BURIAL OF LORD ELGIN.

THE Earl of Elgin, Viceroy and Governor-General of India, died at Dhurumsalla, on the 20th of November last, and was buried the following day in Dhurumsalla churchyard, "in a sweet spot selected by Lady Elgin herself, at his request." We give (from photographs taken by Mr. G. D. Lyon) Engravings of the house in which his Lordship died and of the spot where he his remains.

Lord Elgin's last words showed the composure and calmness with which he met death. He received the announcement that his end was at hand from his able physician, Dr. Macrae, with perfect resignation, and shortly afterwards received the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. In the complete possession of all his faculties, and with implicit Christian confidence and trust, moreover, with the tenderest consideration for the feelings and wishes of Lady Elgin, the Viceroy made his will, signed his private papers, and gave particular orders regarding his grave and his funeral. So gradually did he sink that all the arrangements for his grave, tomb, and funeral were ready several days before his death. It was his particular wish that his tomb might be plain and simple, his funeral perfectly private and unostentatious. But very few mourners stood around his grave. A plain but massive stone will cover it, and a cross 27 ft. high will be the only monument to mark his resting-place.

The following picture of the lovely valley in which the lamented Viceroy rests will interest many :—"Kangra, said by Lord Canning to be the most beautiful district in India, except Cashmere, is a most lovely fertile valley surrounded by lofty mountains, interspersed with undulating hills, and situated between the rivers Barree and Beiley. On one side it has the territories of Cashmere and Chumba, on the other the wild but romantic hunting-field of Kulloo Spite and Lodak. In the eloquent words of George Barnes, late Settlement Commissioner of this province :—'Various races of men, belonging to distinct types of the human family, and speaking different languages, are distributed over its surface. Here are hills just raised above the level of the plain, and mountain crests higher than any peak of the Andes. Every tone of climate and variety of vegetation is here to be met with—from the scorching heat and exuberant growth of the tropics, and barren heights destitute of verdure and capped with perpetual snow. Hills dissolve into gentle slopes, and platforms of table-land and valleys become convulsed and upheaved, so as no longer to be distinguished from the ridges which environ them. I know no spot in the Himalaya which for beauty can compete with the Kangra Valley and these overshadowing hills : no scenery in my opinion presents such sublime and delightful contrasts. Below lies the plain, a picture of rural loveliness and repose. The surface is covered with the richest cultivation, irrigated by streams which descend from perennial snows, and interspersed with homesteads buried in the midst of groves and fruit-trees. Turning from this scene of peaceful beauty, the stern and majestic hills above (Dhurmsalla) confront us. Their sides are furrowed with precipitous watercourses. Forests of oak clothe their flank, and higher up give place to gloomy and funereal pines. Above all are wastes of snow or pyramidal masses of granite too perpendicular for the snow to rest on.'"

On the top of the hill, immediately over the church, is situated the house in which Lord Elgin died. The other buildings near it are the gaol and barracks of huts of the native regiment stationed there.

The relatives of Lady Elgin have been informed that her Ladyship and family embarked at Calcutta on the 28th ult., and were expected to reach Suez on the 16th inst., en route to England.

MR. CHARLES MATHEWS, AS "UN ANGLAIS TIMIDE."

MR. CHARLES MATHEWS made his first appearance at the St. James's Theatre on Monday, the 11th, when he was well received by a numerous and fashionable audience, in two of his old and popular pieces — namely, "The Adventures of a Love Letter" and "Cool as a Cucumber." The former is the latter drama, lately acted in Paris by him, in French, as "Un Anglais Timide," we this week present a Portrait of this excellent comedian, in the character of Plumper. A glance at this will be sufficient to bring forcibly to mind those peculiar traits of style which distinguish this artist from his contemporaries. Here we have a character which is in continual bustle, exhibiting the utmost effrontery, and amazing ordinary people with his bold familiarities ; yet the actor demonstrates in every motion the utmost serenity—in a word, the "cucumber" sort of coolness, predicated in the title. The art of affecting this calm, which is possible to the true artist in combination with the most vehement action, is known by the name of Repose, the attainment of which is the perfection of histrionic skill. Mr. Mathews has sedulously cultivated this attribute, and has attained it so completely that it gives a finish and precision to his slightest assumption. This accounts for Mr. Mathews's popularity with the enlightened portion of the public, and the estimation in which he is held by critics. This final grace is only possible to the most intelligent artist. Mr. Mathews has always made the mind predominant in his acting, and shown at all points the well-educated man and carefully cultivated intellect. For a time, these special qualities seemed to place him at the head of his profession as the best, if not the greatest, of our actors. Even now it would be difficult to describe his faults. His powers are certainly limited ; but within his own magic circle there is none can walk so well as he.

MR. CHARLES MATHEWS AS PLUMPER, IN "COOL AS A CUCUMBER."

THE SULTAN'S YACHT.

THE new yacht Tallah, constructed for his Imperial Majesty by Messrs. Samuda, made her trial-trip recently, with the Turkish Ambassador, M. Musurus, on board. She proceeded at an extraordinary rate from Tilbury Fort to the Nore, where her speed was tried at the measured mile, when the result attained was—against tide, 16·716 knots ; with tide, 19·251 knots, giving on average of 17·75 knots, or twenty miles and a half an hour. The Sultan may thus congratulate himself on possessing one of the swiftest vessels afloat. Her burden is over 1100 tons. The engines, which are by Penn, are marvels of their kind, with a double set of boilers ; the nominal horse power is 350, but that indicated on the trial-trip was 3700. The main object of the vessel is speed. Space is sacrificed to machinery, and she is built on the finest possible lines. On the return home she ran from the Nore to Blackwall (forty-five miles) in two hours and five minutes, the tide being part of the way against her. Her speed is that of an average railway-train, and, according to one account, she rushes through the air at such a pace that it is not easy for a person on deck to keep his hat on, even in a calm. The decorations are of a very splendid description. Messrs. Samuda and Penn may justly feel proud of having constructed this yacht.

The investigation ordered by the Lords of the Admiralty into the whole of the circumstances connected with the equipment, fitting out, and departure from Sheerness of the Confederate privateer Rappahannock, late her Majesty's screw gun-vessel Victor, has been completed. None of the officials connected with Chatham Dockyard were in the remotest degree connected with the illegal proceedings. It has been ascertained, however, that certain officials at Sheerness Dockyard have been guilty of a gross neglect of duty, and at the same time have committed an unwarrantable violation of the neutrality laws. The Government have decided on prosecuting the principal offender, who is one of the chief officers in the dockyard, for the leading part it has been ascertained he took in the equipment and subsequent departure of the Rappahannock from the Nore. Accordingly, the agents of the Solicitor to the Treasury applied to the magistrates for a warrant for the apprehension of Mr. William Bomble, principal engineer and inspector of machinery afloat, who is charged with a violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act (59 George III., cap. 69) in hiring, and attempting to hire, certain seamen for the Confederate steamship Rappahannock ; and also for assisting and aiding in equipping that vessel. The warrants were granted and at once executed, the accused being taken into custody, but liberated on heavy bail.

It will be seen that the profits for the year, after providing for all working expenses, including for the current expenditure, directors' and auditors' remuneration, income tax, and contributing £2,000 to the fund for rebate of interest on bills not yet due, there remains for appropriation the sum of £46,166 19s. 11d.

The Directors recommend the payment of a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, which will absorb £20,000, and that the balance of £26,166 19s. 11d. be carried to the credit of the Reserve, which will amount thereby, until then amount to £50,166 19s. 11d.

The directors who retire by rotation on this occasion are M. R. Preston, Esq.; Mackenzie Bell, Esq., C.E.; Frederick Hall, Esq.; J. E. Thomson, Esq., all of whom, being eligible, offer themselves for re-election.

The shareholders have also to elect auditors for the current year.

With reference to the advertisement announcing the proposed amalgamation of the Company with the Union Bank of London, your paper unanimously assented to the amalgamation, and the terms decided upon at the meeting.

The Directors have much pleasure in calling the attention of the shareholders to the fact that during the business of the Company, which has commenced by borrowing deposits and by accommodating the principles of the Company in their dealings with the public, the Company has never suspended payment.

By order of the Board,
R. P. WEBBER, Manager.

TO THE SHAREHOLDERS IN THE NATIONAL DISCOUNT COMPANY (LIMITED).

Your Directors, in submitting for your consideration the question of further subscription to the capital of the company, are actuated by the belief that such a step would most materially advance the interests of the shareholders, and that the profits of the company would be, in the first place, to the extent proposed, an amount of the prosperity of the company during the last three years.

Half-year ending.	Net Profits.	Per Cent. of Capital.	Rate of Dividend.	Amount carried forward to next account.	Amount carried to Reserve Fund.
June 30, 1861	£7,167	1.79	3 per cent.	£7,167	£4,178
December 31, 1861 ...	12,345	3.08	...	12,345	17,437
June 30, 1862	16,833	4.20	5 per cent.	16,833	27,437
December 31, 1862 ...	20,166	5.04	...	20,166	37,437
June 30, 1863	26,166	6.54	10 per cent.	26,166	50,166
December 31, 1863 ...	20,000	5.00	...	20,000	50,166

It will thus be seen that the profits of the last six half years show an increase of 1.46 per cent on the last dividend, and an increase of 3.46 to 11 per cent on previous, but one direction, in the recommendation of the Directors to pay a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent, and the two increases of the reserve would be that of 11,000l. to be made up the reserve at the rate even of smaller dividends. In this view the Directors have not full confidence, and the wishes of the company have been proved by the increased business and greater confidence shown by the public, and the reserve would be sufficient to answer such a position.

It may by some be considered advisable to wait until, by gradual increase of profits, the reserve fund shall be equal to the paid-up capital, at which point, by the terms of the deed, the profits of the company become divisible among the shareholders, but your directors are of opinion that the present is a favourable opportunity for the increase of capital, and that the reserve would, probably to some extent, be required at some time during the company upon a basis which seems to them to promise the growing confidence of the public, and thereby promote its further success.

The Directors have much pleasure in stating that—

That the capital of the company shall be increased from one to three millions, by the issue of 40,000 new shares, in the proportion of two new shares for every three held.

That the new shares be offered, in the first instance, to the present shareholders, and any shares not taken by them shall be divided among such of the public as may apply, in the proportion of one to every two which he takes up, or allotment will be made.

That the new shares be issued at the price of 10l. per share, which proposition will be found liberal to the old shareholders.

That 2l. on account of the capital and the premium shall be payable on application, and the remainder by such calls as the directors may think fit, giving not less than three months' notice of each call.

These calls would be divided between the capital and reserve funds in the proportion of the amount of each respectively paid up, and the reserve fund would be at once increased to 200,000l.

The capital of the company would then be 2,000,000, its reserve fund 200,000l., and its paid-up capital not under 1,000,000.

Your Directors are aware that some ordinary cases of the issue of new shares at a premium have been made by companies in order to reduce upon the nominal price of the shares, but they have proposed the amount of surplus profits now commonly carried to the reserve fund, and the issue of the new shares at a premium, with increased dividends, in the hope that such an increase would be more given to the present shares as would of itself prove a considerable gain.

Your directors are desirous of avoiding any embarrassment to the old shareholders, and have therefore proposed the additional capital, but it is the opinion of the Board that during the present year has been increased at 5 per cent only, and the increased added to the profits of the last half year has enabled a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent to be made.

72, Cornhill, London, Jan. 14, 1864.

The following resolutions were then unanimously adopted:—

"That the report of accounts now read be received, adopted, and printed for circulation."

"That a dividend at the rate of 5l. per cent upon the paid-up capital income tax, be declared on the paid-up capital of 400,000l. out of the profits earned in the half-year ending the 31st December, 1863, and that the same be payable on and after the 25th January, and that the transfer books be closed from the 16th to the 25th January, inclusive."

"That Francis William Russell, Esq., Alexander Matheson, Esq., William Jas. Thompson, Esq., John Robert Thomson, Esq., who retire by rotation on this occasion, be re-elected directors of the company."

"That James Maclaren Bell, Esq., and Joseph Robert Morrison, Esq., be re-elected auditors for the current year, and that their remuneration be £105 per annum each, inclusive."

"That the thanks of the meeting be given to the board of directors for their services and attention have been unremitting in their duties to the management of the company's affairs, which has been conducted with so much success during the past year."

FRANCIS WILLIAM RUSSELL, Chairman.

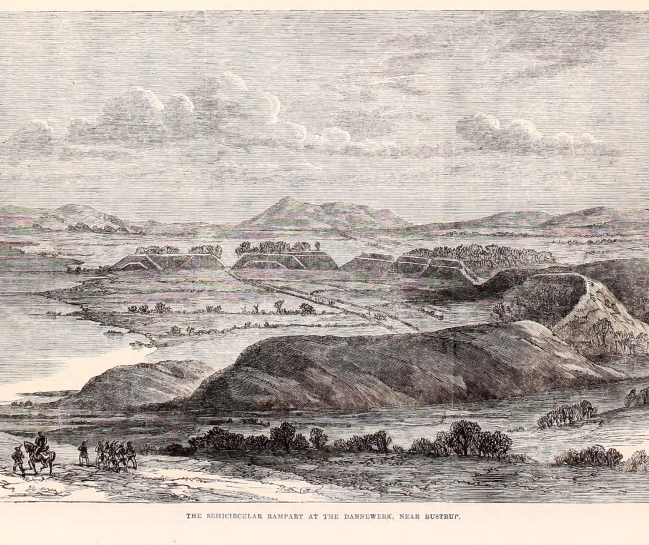
THE SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN DIFFICULTY.

THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE DANISH FORCES.

Christian Julius De Meza, who now occupies the important post of Commander-in-Chief of the Danish forces, was born, on Jan. 14, 1792, in Elsinore (or, as the Danes call it, Helsingör), spoken of by Shakespeare in his tragedy of "The Prince of Denmark." By-the-by, it may be here mentioned, as a curious fact, that Hamlet (pronounced Amleth) was a native of Jutland, and that his name in the land of the Jutes signifies "madman."

At the siege of Copenhagen by the English, in 1807, De Meza was made Stylk-junker (First Artillery Cadet) in the citadel of Frederickshafen; and later he became teacher in the Artillery Institution and Military High School of Denmark. This post he quitted, in 1842, in order to become Major in one of the artillery corps. At the breaking out of the Revolution, in 1848, De Meza was appointed Commander of the Artillery, in which capacity he distinguished himself at the attacks upon Schleswig, Düp, and other places. In December, 1848, De Meza was made Colonel, and on April 16, 1849, he was nominated Chief of the Artillery as well as of the brigade, consisting of 15,000 men, which the Danish Commander-in-Chief had left in the Isle of Alsen. At the head of this force De Meza took an active part in the battle of Fredericia. On the 1st of January, 1850, he was promoted to the rank of Major-General; but, on account of illness, he was unable to take command at the third fight in Schleswig. Still, being too restive to remain idly at home, he followed the Staff of General Krogh, with whom he was associated on the 24th and 25th of July, when the news of the misfortune in the fight by Stolk (Isded) arrived. By desire, De Meza at once took the command of the fallen General Schleppegrell's troops, reorganised the scattered divisions, and for the second time led the artillery and columns to the attack of the enemy, and at length completely routed the opposing troops. After the war, De Meza was appointed Inspector of the United Artillery Corps. This post, however, he gave up, and was made commanding General of the forces in Flensburg (Schleswig), Jutland, and Fyen. On the 21st of April, 1860, De Meza became Lieutenant-General.



GENERAL DE MEZA, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE DANISH ARMY AT THE DANNEWERK POSITION.

Many of our readers will doubtlessly feel surprised at the oddity of the Portrait of the General here given. This, however, is from a photograph taken in Copenhagen, in which his Excellency appears dressed in the negligé of morning attire rather than decked out in all the splendour of a Commander-in-Chief's uniform. But De Meza, like many a great man, has his peculiarities, and, instead of dazzling the world with the bright shoulder-knots and decorations of military paraphernalia, prefers rather to let himself be recognised in the unostentatious dress of morning civilian life.

Whilst staying in Flensburg our Correspondent happened to put up at the same hotel that General De Meza had previously occupied when officiating as Commander of that city; and during his residence there he heard of many of the peculiarities of the good-natured but eccentric officer. His Excellency occupied the whole of the first floor, consisting of a suite of six rooms, one leading into another; nevertheless, he was accustomed to live in the two end apartments, for he had an especial horror of draughts, so that anyone wishing to see him had to pass through four rooms which were kept duly heated before being admitted to an audience. How the gallant Commander manages to exclude the cold air in field life it is impossible to explain, but it is said that he insists upon having a series of tents in connection with his own. Despite his oddities, however, every one agrees that De Meza is a right good fellow, and one of the finest Generals that Denmark has seen for many a year.

THE DANNEWERK.

The great fortification of Schleswig which bears the above name, signifying literally the work par excellence of the Danes, consists of an enormous series of earth-banks stretching right across the long narrow peninsula of Schleswig, Holstein, and Jutland. This peninsula is 300 miles long (which is nearly the length of the southern base line of our own triangular island), and in some parts as much as 100 miles in breadth. The extensive fastness itself is situated within a few miles of the southern boundary of the duchy of Schleswig, and stretches close up to the capital from which the duchy derives its nane—A name which means merely the wick, or village (Latin, vicus), built on the margin of the river Schley, and hence called Schleywick, or Schleswig. The river Schley is a long arm of the Baltic, which is in some parts half a mile in width, and in others only a hundred paces broad. In the immediate vicinity of the capital this river forms a large pool, or lake, and this circumstance has been taken advantage of in the construction of the artificial defences of the country.

The Dannewerk itself, which (as we shall hereafter explain) forms but one of the three immense rampart-walls constituting the entire fortification, though its ordinary name, the name by which we used as the general title for the whole series of earthworks, is a structure of great antiquity; indeed, we are inclined to believe that originally it was merely an enormous dyke erected by the early settlers in the country to protect their lands against the inroads of the sea. Even to the present day the most important dykes in Schleswig resemble the ramparts that surround a regularly fortified town, and often vie in depth and size of 22 ft. above high-water mark, so that the country bears the aspect of a large extent of rich pasture lands and well-cultivated fields, separated at regular intervals by high, rampart-like earth mounds, the tops or combs of which are often from 18 ft. to 20 ft. in width, and are locally known by the name of "Kog," or "Koog," the interior name being known by the name of "Groden" or "Groode." He this as it may, however, there is no doubt that the Dannewerk is one of the most extensive and most ancient works in the world. Those formed part of the bandwork of Celtic frontiers here before they had become acquainted with the metallurgic arts; and at the places where they had been found the very means by which they had been worked had been discovered with them, in the form of knuckle-bonelike nodules of the hardest gritstone, hollowed with plates for the fingers of the workmen, and masses of flint-stone by which lay the splinters of flint that had been recently chipped from them, as if the neolithic artist had been at work about the very spot of his work; while in other parts hard, boneslike slabs had been dug up that were engraved all over with the grinding of the bone-polishers' blades, some of which, half finished, had been found in connection with the very tools that had been used to give them their edge and their finish.

The Dannewerk, therefore, is a structure as long precedent to history as the art of metal working was prior to the invention of the alphabet itself. Advancing, however, to the era of written chronicles, we learn that in the ninth century this great "border wall" was, according to the accounts given of it in "Old Tryggvesen's Saga," "built from sea to sea, both north and south, and so strong that it was erected by the old pagan Kings of Denmark to protect the duchy (which then bore the name of Southern Jutland) against the incursions of invaders on the only side from which the seagirt country was accessible.

In the year 937 the earth-wall of the Dannewerk was rebuilt by Queen Thyra, the wife of Gorm the Old (or in Denmark the sole) founder of Copenhagen), who erected the rampart in honour of her patriotic act the people surnamed her "Danebod" (the pride of the Danes). During this period the wall is said to have accommodated eight English miles across the country, and to have reached from the Selber Lake, adjoining the town of Schleswig, to the Treene, a river which is the little stream of the Treene, near the village of Hollingstedt, about the same distance from the Schley. Within these regular intervals strong fortresses were erected along its entire length, and a third (1.0), with an open bridge, was placed over the centre of the line, in the same side of it.

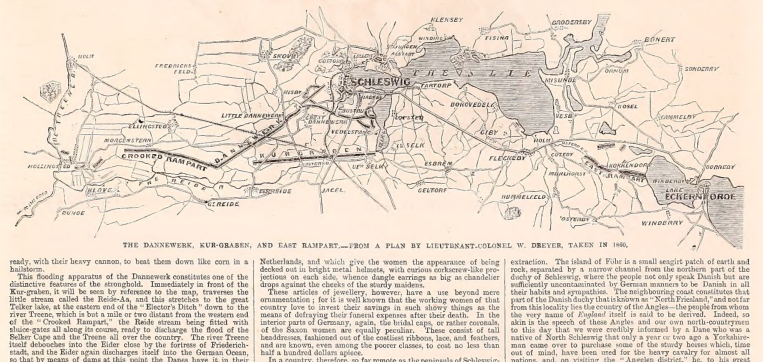
Briefly, that is all that is known concerning the history of the fortification now under consideration. As it at present exists it is a far different structure from the rude levelled dyke and ditch that it must originally have been in olden time. Nevertheless, it is a curious instance of the first defences constructed long before the science of warfare had taken its first step in advance, which still constitute the best of all protections against the attacks of the invader; for we were assured during our recent visit to the country that in a series of experiments had recently been instituted at Copenhagen as to the relative powers of ramparts and bastions, the former were found to be the most effective, and that the latter were altogether useless, and that it was shown that neither granite nor the hardest possible cement had the same power of endurance against cannon as the rude old earthworks erected by the barbarian aborigines of the country.

The Dannewerk as it now stands consists essentially of three distinct and separate earth-walls, which, small as they may appear in the accompanying map, are, nevertheless, works of tremendous extent, and enormous labour, when the first engineers had to be taken into consideration. To the east stretches the "Outer-wolden," as it is termed, and which, literally translated, means the outermost rampart, from which towards the west side of the coast extends the "Krum-wolden" (crooked rampart), together with the third or innermost of these ramparts, a great part of which goes by the name of Valdemar's Wall, of which an Engraving is given (in another place) as it existed previous to the present improvements. These ramparts consist essentially of enormous earth-mounds or dykes, arranged like the mouth of a funnel, so as to drive any invading army up into the narrowest possible channel, at which point the "Breckenkopf" or, tête-de-pont, is situated, where, from the great strength of the batteries, it would be almost impossible for any body of troops to force a passage.

By reference to the accompanying Map it will be observed that the East Rampart is so arranged as to drive any approaching troops onwards towards the great lake, formed by the River Schley, which is here so broad as well protected by forts that it would be idle for any army to attempt to cross the water at that point; while, at the narrower part by the Mysund there exist, on the opposite shore, the great Margrethen Wall, as it is termed, and at which the entire population of Denmark is said in the olden time to have gathered for three long years. Immediately below the bay on which the city of Schleswig is situated lies the great Selber lake, which may be seen to extend, and on the other side of these there is the great Half-Circle Fortification (of which we have given a Plan) and an Engraving) capable of a body to rain bullets upon any troops that may be rash enough to land there.

Nor is this all. Another of the tripartite elements of this extensive defence consists in the great Danish earthwork which runs from the end of the "Kur-graben," or Prince Elector's Ditch, which stretches in a straight line from the ridge of hills to the north-west, almost to the diagonal line of Valdemar's Wall itself.

The dimensions of these different ramparts are as follows:—



1. The Kur-graben is upwards of four miles long, and from 12 ft. to 12 ft. broad, and from 12 ft. to 16 ft. high.

2. The Outer-wolden, or Rampart, is two English miles in length, 6 ft. high, and 16 paces broad. Moreover, it is beset with a ditch that is 10 ft. deep.

3. The Dannewerk itself, including the "Crooken Rampart," is no less than fourteen miles long, and in some parts from 16 ft. to 18 ft. high, whilst its breadth on the top ranges from 16 ft. to 20 ft.

The Dannewerk itself is protected by fourteen distinct forts, or "schanzen," as they are called; and at Bustorf, where the roads leading from the north come to a point, the forts are guarded by cannon of two hundred pounds calibre, and all the works surrounded by palisades.

The great strength of the Dannewerk, however, lies in the flooding, apparatus that is connected with it; and by which means, it is said no less than 20,000 men could be kept at bay on the north of the land, in front of the earth-walls can be immediately put under water, and the invading army thus be driven back in a passage along the remaining tenth portion of the country where the strongest fortresses are situate, and ready, with their heavy cannon, to beat them down like corn in a hailstorm.

This flooding apparatus of the Dannewerk constitutes one of the distinctive features of the stronghold. Immediately in front of the Kur-graben, it will be seen by reference to the map, traverses the little stream called the Reide-Aa, and this stretches to the great Volker lake, at the eastern end of the "Electer's Ditch" down to the river Treene, which is but a mile or two distant from the western end of the "Crooked Rampart," the whole forming a complete chain of sluice-gates all along its course, ready to discharge the flood of the Selber Cape and the Treene all over the country. The river Treene itself debouches into the Eider close by the ancient Danish fortress stadt, and the Eider again discharges itself into the German Ocean, so that by means of dams at this point the Danes have in their power to arrest the course of the great body of water, which would otherwise be poured into the German Ocean, and to discharge it over the entire lowland country immediately in front of the Dannewerk itself. At the time of the writer's visit to the country the whole land had been inundated a fortnight previously; and, as the thermometer stood then at eleven degrees of frost, the enormous waste of ice was the consequence. But no sooner had the vast flood over the land become thawed than the water beneath was immediately discharged, and a thin and fragile frozen crust alone left for the troops to flounder through. Indeed, the Danes tell you that, winter or summer, the flooding operation is equally effective, and it is doubtful whether in this layer of unsupported ice would not be found even more formidable to an invading army than in the water itself. Let engineers settle the point. The Danish officers seem to be in no doubt as to the security of their position, although the story runs that at a grand review of the troops a year or two ago, a Prussian General who was present asked them what they would do if at least 100,000 men to force a passage beyond the earthworks; though, on the other hand, he said the fortifications were on such a stupendous extent that as many as 40,000 men would be necessary to hold them.

There are no pleas or pleas of the Dannewerk to be had in the country other than those which accompany the present article. In one of the foreign illustrated papers an engraving of one of the forts was given. In several of the London papers also some correspondent consisted stated that the artist must have sketched it from fancy, and that there was nothing like it to be seen in the land. The publication of any plans is said to be forbidden by the Danish Government; but there was a report that the English officers had worked as common labourers at the late improvements and earthworks, and had sketched every part of the fortifications, a perfect drawings of the whole of the defences to the German authorities.

THE SCHLESWIG NATIONAL COSTUMES.

Geography has many different forms. There is the geography of eating and drinking, and the geography of the sea and the land, of rivers and mountains. Countries differ as much in dirt and in costume as they do even in their particular scenery. The members of the "Acclimatisation Society" delight in dinners once a year, whereat the lover of good cheer may eat and drink his way right round the world, beginning with the bird's-nest soup of China and concluding with jellies made from the moss of Iceland. Even so, the world's fancy ball is made up of an infinite variety of costumes. At Madame Tussaud's we see the habits of our ancestors historically arranged; but it still remains for some enlightening entrepreneur to arise and bring together models of the different tribes of the earth grouped in all the motley varieties of national costume.

Those who have made the sloppy tour along the wet highways of Holland cannot but be struck with the general neatness of the peasantry and the care which is bestowed upon the dress of their women. Netherlands, and which give the women the appearance of being decked out in bright metal helmets, with curious corkscrew-like projections on each side, whence depend chains of the same embroider drops against the cheeks of the sturdy maidens.

These articles of jewellery, however, have a use beyond mere ornamentation; for it is well known that the working women of that country love to invest their savings in such showy things as the means of defraying their funeral expenses after their death. In the interior parts of Germany, again, the bridal caps, or rather coronals, of the Saxon women are remarkable for their splendour. At full headdresses, fashioned out of the costliest ribbons, lace, and feathers, and are known even among the poorer classes to cost no less than half a hundred dollars apiece.

In a country, therefore, so far remote as the peninsula of Schleswig-Holstein from the influence of the Courier de Dames, it is but natural that we should find the most peculiar costumes, and the most undisguised by crinoline. But picturesquely costumed in all the peculiarities of some national habits which are fast disappearing from the towns and villages nearer to the centres of fashion and civilisation. In the four illustrations of the costumes which accompany this Article that in the one which represents the young milk girl of the Dannewerk, the dress differs but little from that of the Vierlander peasant girls who form so remarkable a feature in the streets of Hamburg, where they may be seen in their cymbal-shaped hats, wheeling along enormous trucks, with milk pails hanging upon a pair of lanmen-ash wheels, and "the sides and ends of which dangle no end of bright coloured tassels, all filled with the milk required for the tea-table.

In the Dannewerk, however, it will be seen by the engraving that the young milk girl of the Schleswig adopts the yoke, which in the more southern parts of the country is used solely for the transport of vegetables. The costume of the Holstein cities carrying their cabbages and potatoes about in baskets by the same means as the Schleswigers adopt for the conveyance of their milk-cans from house to house.

Another figure among the group represents a peasant wife of the Dannewerk, who, not unlike ladies upon a pair of pattens, wears a high-heeled shoe, with

THE GOTTORP PALACE AT SCHLESWIG.

The little capital of the little duchy of Schleswig is so odd and lazy a metropolis as is to be found out of Germany, where kingdoms are no bigger than London parishes, and their chief cities not near so large as our suburban hamlets. The entire Danish duchy, indeed, contains barely 400,000 inhabitants, and the capital itself numbers within its precincts but 11,000 souls. This little metropolis of one of the 534 Dutchy nobles, 68 have never run; and of the remaining 116 only 7 underwent (2 races), Goodwood (3 races), Ascot (1), General Peel (1), Historian (1), Ivanhoe (1), Miner (1) have never been defeated. The leading tie of the season, Newmarket, was first known as the Lavant, but falling off in the entries is no less than 858 as against 921. The Liverpool Steeplechase has had 1,000 entries, 1,200, and the Grand Cup a decline of 21; but the Prince of Wales' Handicap stores for all.

Perhaps as great the crest "re-purchase" controversy have given one more flicker, thanks to a vigorous poke from the Earl of Glasgow, who was accused of being his brother's keeper. The Marquis of Hastings, or, as the noble Lord explains it, "that the whole circumstances attending the sale of Lord Stamford's property in the Fens (in consideration, in order that the Club might express an opinion favourable to the Established system of Government in Church and Steeple, and hence the little motion died soon after its birth; but in the course of the day "it is by no means certain that the Liberals will nobody else cares for it." That lively "exile" has furnished much food for the pantomimes this Christmas-tide, and the Lord Mayor's Banquet will be the occasion of a fresh outburst of Irish eloquence. Mr. Parnell is to be present, and Mr. Gladstone is to be present, and Mr. Forster is to be present, and Mr. Chamberlain is to be present, and Mr. Bright is to be present, and Mr. Lowe is to be present, and Mr. Goschen is to be present, and Mr. Lowe is to be present, and Mr. Goschen is to be present, and Mr. Lowe is to be present, and Mr. Goschen

PRIZE PIGEONS AT THE SHOW OF THE PHILO-PERISTERON SOCIETY, RECENTLY HELD IN FREEMASONS' HALL.

THE Philo-Peristeron Society held their usual show of pigeons in Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street, on the 12th inst. In number and quality they far excelled any of the previous shows of this society, specimens of nearly every domestic variety being exhibited. The members have indeed just cause of self-congratulation on the event, as also with regard to the great number of prizes carried off by them from the various London and provincial shows during last year. To give some idea of the beauty of the display, we will enumerate some of the varieties. Posters were exhibited by Mr. William Smith, of Halifax, several of which were remarkably good birds, but did not show themselves to advantage, owing, most likely, to the weariness of the birds from their long journey. The several pens of carriers, containing ten and twelve in each pen, were the property of Messrs. Rayne, Carvel, Everett, Dale, Squann, and Chalker, and were wonderfully fine birds, some of them as near perfection as can be expected. The dragon pen contained, among others, the three Birmingham prize pens, a pair of Mr. Jones Percival receiving universal praise. The exhibitors of jacobins were Messrs. Harrison Weir, Wicking, and Eqvilant. Mr. Harrison Weir, who is the president of the society, had the post of honour for his beautiful and distinctive pen of white fantails, which drew around them crowds of admirers. Mr. Wicking had also a splendid pen of white and blue Beauwicks, one of magpies, one of swallows, and one of other varieties. The mealy and short-faced tumblers were good, and especially the properties of those excellent fanciers, Messrs. Lucy and Eqvilant; there were also some well-bred baldheads and beards belonging to the latter gentleman. The three new members, Messrs. Rue, Sanders, and Oats, came out strongly with very fine pens of baldheads, beards, &c., and have, in fact, at once taken a high position among the older members. The hall was very well attended by visitors, some of whom had travelled long distances to be present, and all seemed well pleased. On the whole, the show was one of the greatest success of the kind that has been held since the days of boxing. The pigeons were shown in large mahogany pens, with open fronts for the birds to stand on, and each pen contained from six to sixteen birds.

After the show the members of the society dined together at the tavern—Mr. Harrison Weir, president, in the chair, when some new members were proposed.

A STAMPEDE OF JACKALS.

A WALK through the environs of Calcutta on moonlight reveals to the European stranger many curious sights and sounds. The interminable rows of thatched sheds roofed on one side to the ground, the miniature rows of thatched dwellings and one of the millions, for there are no chimneys in Calcutta, for the cooking is done in the open fronts, answering for the verandah of the houses, or indeed, in the road itself, prepared for the sale of the freer circulation of air. Pets and there be pests with a Hindoo temple, with its hideous idols frowning upon him in the incongruity with another of the Christian faith. On every side are hundreds of tall cocoanut palms, their heads like funeral plumes, as still as death. In the distance the cry of the is a foreign country; but he will probably comprehend this more fully anon. As he turns his corner of the road the howling sound directs his attention to a moving mass of living creatures in front, right across his path; he takes a step or two in advance, and hundreds leave their hiding-haunts, but, as he gazes nervously upon the novel sight, a piercing shriek, like that of some wretch in the direst extremity of torture, rises high in the air, and is immediately taken up and another, until the whole pack is in full chorus. These are the jackals, the scavengers of Calcutta, and as they are seen only in the darkness, one strange somewhat recovers his equanimity, and wonders how it is that the vultures on the tops of the houses and trees in their slumbers disturbed by the hideous noise. But the jackal is a great coward, and, when he has attained his full growth and size, he will sink away from a grown person, or even a boy with a stick in his hand, under cover of some outlying, or ruins, which are numerous in and about Calcutta. Very young children, however, have been carried off and devoured by the pack; and there have been instances of a small jackal running amidst human beings and snapping right and left, and thoroughly and committing fearful havoc amongst the naked legs of the natives. For this reason, and also on account of rabies, produces the worst form of hydrophobia. Happily, these cases are not common, but on the whole, the cry of the pack of these wild jackals in a large centre is probably advantageous, from their habits of preying upon smaller vermin and consuming the offal cast into the streets.

MUSIC.

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, on Thursday in last week, gave its first performance this season of the "Creation." Madame Perosa was announced as the soprano, but owing to indisposition on the part of her husband, the part of Eve was taken by Mme. Leonora Sherrington, who sang with her accustomed brilliancy and effect. Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Maurice Kaufmann, and Mr. Frank Mullings, the magnificent band and chorus of the society, combined to render the performance one of more than ordinary excellence.

To-night Mr. Mapleson opens HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE with an English version of "Faust." The opportunity of hearing Gounod's music in its native tongue is without precedent, and there is not little doubt that the enjoyment of the spirited mise-en-scène will be attended with success. The cast will include the well-known names of Madame Maconda, Sherrington, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, and Signor Marchesi. Mr. Bevan's new production of Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" as a supplementary season but autumn will be fresh in the recollection of many of our readers.

On Monday the MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS will reconvence, with an excellent programme. M. Vieuxtemps will make his first appearance this season, and the vocalists will be Madame Phipps and Mr. Santley.

Although the combined attractions of "Fanchette" and the Pantomime continue nightly to attract large audiences to the ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE, the managers are by no means resting on their laurels. Preparations are, we are told, on foot, on a large scale, for the production of Auchester's new opera, the words of which are taken from the "Sir Roger de Coverley" Goldsmith's celebrated essay. The nightly sitting and gaiety, has doubtless inspired our great English composer with the happy idea of treating the subject in a like manner, which, it is said, he produced as soon as is consistent with the present arrangements of the management.

THE THEATRES.

STRAND.—A new farce, written by Mr. W. Hancock, has been produced here, and, though very slight in construction, is distinctly amusing. It is entitled "Margate Sands," and at once transports us to the most popular of our seaside watering-places, where bathing-machines, donkeys each other's machines, exchange clothes. Mr. Belford and Mr. Wood support the two leaders, and do especially good work in the parts of Mr. Dolphus Pilkington and Carnation Curleycrop. The former comes to Margate to meet his wife, and the latter to keep an assignation with a female who has answered a matrimonial advertisement. This hopeful young lady is played by Barbara Deane, who is a newcomer to the stage, selected by Miss Maria Simpson, who makes a regular guy of herself in the part. Her performance is properly rough, and deserves the full applause of the audience. Barbara, owing to the change of attire, mistakes Dolphus for Curleycrop, and vice-versâ, hilarity ensues. Ultimately an explosion takes place in the bathing-machine, which is blown to pieces; but at length explanations come, and peace is restored. Importance has been given to this trifle, which is similarity to a host of its kind, by Mr. Belford, who, under the title of "Betting," was performed at the Gympie some years ago by Mr. Hancock. Mr. Belford's version is very much superior to that piece, and, beyond the leading suggestion, the two dramas have little in common. Mr. Belford has given us a fine recollection of Playgoers as an excellent example of the humorous drama: the present is not without merit, and depends more on incident than dialogue. It is much indebted to the performers for its success.

CHESS.

John T. Gordon, Esq., Sheriff Depute of the county of Wiltonsyth, a present sojourning at Oxen, in Nazmandy, gave tin on the 16th inst. to the officers there for his men. The entertainment, which was on a grand scale, consisted of a lecture on Shakespeare, by Romaine Rhadamanthus, Esq., and a performance of "Macbeth," in which Mr. Gordon played the part of Macduff. The scene when they produced a monster plum-pudding, the size of a cart-wheel, among these men were like Titans, and their disinterestedness of the town, and also quite a galaxy of female beauty, French and English.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Hard Cash. By Charles Reade. (3 vols. Sampson Low, Son, and Marston.) This is a really great work, whether it be regarded from the fictional or from its matter-of-fact aspect. For it is twofold in its nature—to use thoughtlers it is a beautiful romance, to the thoughtful a stirring reality; and one scarcely knows which to admire most—the genius which has invented, embodied, and coloured the unreal scenes, or the industry which has collected, arranged, and distributed the facts. Inspect carefully, too, the style and the language, and you are scarcely able to affirm that a single word, a turn of speech or fancy you detect, conscious inequalities, occasional incongruities, occasional spasmodic or occasional commonplace, but the whole is the whole of a piece affected by them than is the clear diamond by the specks upon his surface. Intensity is Mr. Reade's chief characteristic, the intensity of purpose which seems to be his motto. Whether it be love, or hate, or scorn, or whatever other influence disturbs the human breast, there is the same intensity. He loves, he hates, he scorns, and running over, he gives into your bosom. He can describe as no other man can the workings of passion, whether of love, woman's love, and woman's hate; and woman's constant, fervent, and unchanging love, rendering, perhaps, irresistible ways. No is there any mawkish sentimentality about his women—they do not faint, and languish, and swoon, and weep, then chill him with a cold salute; they are flesh and blood—and warm blood, too; the sentiment is natural, natural to the character, natural to the situation, natural to the time; they flush, and think, and act quicker at a lover's touch. Yet he shows no want of that Christian teaching, how teaching that is from which lacks that curb; so that his Julia is a bride meet for the king of men, his Edith Archibald for the Prince of Darkness. Of course, as we always demonstrate, neither is Mr. Reade; he is not more at home with the truthful, or the respectably tortuous than with the ethereal, which runs so still because so deep—not more happy in his treatment of innocence—Julia in that of guilt—Edith Archibald. Neither one nor the other is comfortable in him; oh! but he can be gentle, too. If he is powerful as a giant, he is also light as a fairy. If he can wield with the sledge-hammer, he can also tickle with the feather. He sometimes bites spitefully, he sometimes pinches painfully; and he satires, though rarely, in a free hitter. Who will not perceive and participate in the pleasantry of the following passage?—"Mr. Dodd's pocket-book then and there opened in vain before more than four trains reach Silverton from different points between 8.50 and 9.25 a.m." And many pages sparkle with the good-natured humour of this sort over, be it said, not to great effect the crystal-pointed shafts of sarcasm are to be found and enjoyed, and the complements his own missiles with weapons from the armoury of scholarship. And herein is one proof, if any were needed, that the term "sensation novelist" does not (as he himself asserts) apply to him; the true sensation novelist knows the taste of his readers well to garnish the dish of horrors and excitement with flowers from the garden of literature. If Mr. Reade desired popularity only—he sought number merely and not quality of readers, he would have eschewed Latin altogether, and adopted the middle English. At the same time, we must be allowed to say that few men (who were reading for a first class, even) would like to have their sanity, so far as memory is concerned, tested by the ability to take to pieces and examine for six or seven lines a medical man's pet passage from Lucas or even Copland. However, let that pass; and let Mr. Reade console himself—if his readers be fewer than his merits would seem to call for—that he not written down to the level of the average novel reader, but up to the mark of the scholar. Yet all, whether they have had a classical education or not, can appreciate the description of the boat-race (more lifelike and more exciting than that of Virgil), of the cricket at Alton Locke's, of the night attack on the shipwreck, of the fire at the madhouse, and of many more exciting events too numerous to particularise. Then, too, the sketches, the well-drawn and different types of love, their trials, their cruel separation, and their ultimate bliss; with manly, simple, unfortunate Richard Hardie; unmanly, unskilful, but Christian-like, with gentle, brave, good Captain Dodd, his "hard cash" and his wife's love for her son, the Rev. Charles Archibald. Dodd, indeed, can assail their teeth and clench their fists at selfish, calculating, morally Richard Hardie; they can rave at madhouse doctors, madhouse law, and madhouse bullies, and laugh over eccentric but shrewd Dr. Sampson Wycliffe, the madhouse doctor "generally" speaking, and Voysinian the bombastic but noble-hearted "nigger." In fact, they can read a novel a better than a mirror, and see reflected in it, not themselves, but themselves as they ought to be. Mr. Reade himself will ever write. "Hard Cash" combines in itself a love-story, an attack upon private madhouses, and a tale of the mutiny, and each stories usually end; the hero and heroine, who go through almost as much as was Heaven for Hercules, settle down in the happiness of married life, and the villain, or villain's confederates for a doubling-up punishment. The lesson taught is family union; remember, indeed, the last words of Captain Dodd. The moral lesson to learn in a selfish world, where the father not seldom forsakes the son, the son the father, and brother and sister, or haply the sister (and how then must it fare with more distant kin?), in the terrible struggle hasten to be rich; but if it were a little more taken to heart would there not be fewer hours in the streets, fewer inmates in the madhouses, fewer cells in the hospital, fewer lunatics in the asylum? Perhaps not, but it is worth a thought. The attack is directed against certain abuses in certain systems, especially as they affect an allegation of insanity. Mr. Reade brings grave charges against both medical men and the law, and he does not say his own experience, as related by himself in an appendix to his novel, and remembered, no doubt, by all newspaper readers, gives him a very fair basis for his attack, and many instances which he has hunted up or had communicated to him, and which not only confirm the authority of personal observation, but bear testimony. He professes to allege facts, and, with the carelessness characteristic of such, he does, and sometimes overwhelms us with them. It is for the professional men, whose intelligence and honour are believed in by the generality unquestioningly, to answer the charges for us it suffices to say that, even if such things as Mr. Reade describes are true, but can be, there are not many who believe them. In conclusion, it should be observed that the reader for mere amusement (for whom, very likely, Mr. Reade cares little) must make up his mind for a good deal of scientific jargon, if cases requiring professions or sciences cannot be conducted on any other terms. And now must Reade dismiss the hard-working, clever novel, and not at the change of title from "Very Hard Cash" for what does "Hard Cash" suggest? Simply, money; not "Very Hard Cash" speaks three volumes in three words.

Another Day's Life. By Georgeee Godwin, F.R.S. (1 vol. W. H. Allen and Co.) The title must not mislead the reader into supposing that he has come upon a treatise on astronomy, or on any thing which was so successfully practised upon a late occasion by Mr. Thomas King. This is a love-story written by a plain-thinking gentleman, already well known as the champion of the poor and miserable, for the sake of those unfortunates who cannot speak for their breath—but faintly, but painfully—in the fetid dwelling-places of Whitechapel, Bethnal-green, and Spitalfields, and even in the working-cans of brilliant Regent-street and other gaudy fashionable fares. Let those who only want to know where wretchedness lurks to hide it, and for those who have the power and harden their hearts to misery which they know of but will not acknowledge, read the revelations and listen to the appeals. If his words and the engravings which illustrate them do not prompt the wealthy, and influential, and the rich to do their duty, it will be that the spirit which moved the good Samaritan has no longer a place amongst us. And such a thought is terrible to contemplate. Not so much is certainly being done, as the daily papers daily inform us; but, if Mr. Godwin's book be read, it will be seen how much more is required. Mr. Godwin only wishes people to read and to think, and we would add our earnest entreaties to his.

The great task of printing copies of "Domesday Book" by the process of photozincography, ordered by Sidney Sir Henry James, has just been completed. That unrivalled record of the past has been reduced to the original density in the Public Record Repository, each of the returns for the several counties of England inscribed in the pages being as accessible over a publisher's counter to the public at a comparatively trifling outlay.

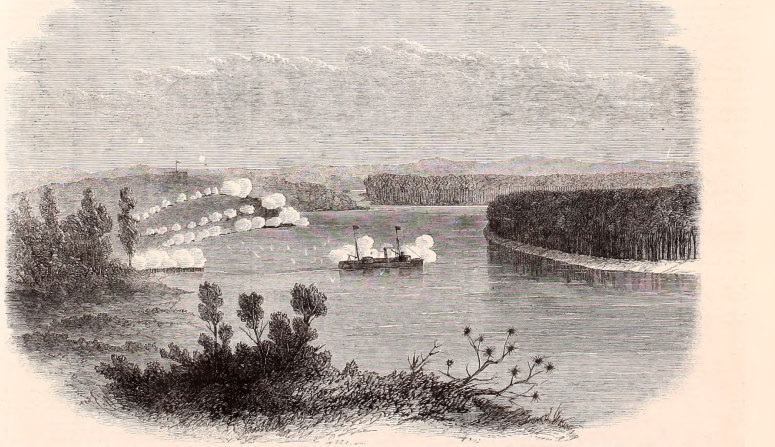
THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1243.—VOL. XLIV. SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1864. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE



MARCHING TOWARDS THE PRECIPICE.

THE country felt immense relief last Monday morning on being told by the Times that the Dano-German quarrel was in a fair way of being settled without an appeal to arms. The pleasant mirage was dissipated in the afternoon by a second edition of that journal, which contained an announcement of an entirely opposite character. We give, in as few words as possible, the successive phases assumed by the question, and our readers will draw their own conclusions as to the Powers upon whom will rest the responsibility of breaking the peace of Europe, if it be eventually broken.

The vote of the secondary and minor States of Germany represented in the Federal Diet, by which the joint proposition of Austria and Prussia was rejected, had the effect of bringing back the contention within its original limits. This was far enough from the intention of the majority. The drift of their proceedings, as also of their hopes, was to unite the duchy of Schleswig with that of Holstein under Frederick of Augustenburg, and thereby annex the former to the territory of the Bund. The unanimity and enthusiasm of the German people in favour of this course made the several Governments heedless of the international rights which it infringed. Neither Austria nor Prussia, however, was prepared to incur the dangerous responsibility of treating with indifference the public law of Europe. As soon, therefore, as they found themselves in a minority of the Diet as to the object for which the military occupation of Schleswig was to be undertaken, they gave notice that they would take the settlement of the matter into their own hands, not as representing the Diet, but in their capacity as leading European Powers. They forthwith transmitted their demand to Copenhagen that the November Constitution should be withdrawn within forty-eight hours, and, this having been impracticable at so short a notice, they suspended diplomatic relations with the Court and Government of King Christian IX., and instantly began to push forward their troops to the south bank of the Eider.

It was generally assumed that the hot haste with which this movement had been made arose rather from the desire of the two great Powers to prevent a precipitation of war by the secondary German States than from the intention of making a casus belli against Denmark. The presence of the duke of Augustenburg in Holstein; the revolution which, with the connivance of the armies of Saxony and Hanover in occupation of the duchy, was setting aside the stipulations of the London Treaty of 1852 for regulating the succession; the contagious effect of that revolution upon the German population of Schleswig; and the manifest bias of the majority of the Diet towards a recognition of Prince Frederick's hereditary claims and towards an armed intervention in support of them, disclosed to the two Powers the necessity of placing their own troops, at the earliest possible moment, between the Danes and the federal army of occupation. Hence, it was thought, the peremptory tone of their demand upon Denmark, and hence the limited time they allowed her for a reply. The answer of Denmark, which had been clearly foreseen, was the signal for the immediate advance of the Austro-Prussian troops into Holstein. The line of the Eider is no longer in the possession of Saxon and Hanoverian soldiers. The Diet, awed by overwhelming force, cedes its place upon the frontier to the two Powers. The question to be enforced, as against Denmark, has ceased to be one affecting the integrity of that kingdom, or having for its object the frustration of the London Treaty of 1852; and the simple design of Austria and Prussia, if they should invade the duchy of Schleswig, is given out to be to occupy it as a "material guarantee" for the performance of certain engagements relating to the internal government of that duchy, to which Denmark diplomatically bound herself in 1849 and 1852, but which, it is admitted, she had not observed with fidelity.

It will be seen at a glance how, on the hypothesis that Austria and Prussia were sincerely discharging their duty as European Powers, the position in which they had placed themselves might simplify the question in an international point of view. By a military convention with Prussia, by subsequent despatches, and by other forms having the force of a diplomatic agreement, Denmark had pledged hersell to the German Powers to pursue a certain course of government in Schleswig with a view to the just and impartial treatment of its German inhabitants, and to take no steps towards an incorporation of the duchy with the kingdom of Denmark proper. It is alleged against her that she has not redeemed her pledge in either case. She has not governed Schleswig as she undertook to do, and by the November Constitution she has taken steps towards the incorporation of the province with the kingdom. Austria and Prussia are upon the basis of the Treaty of Vienna to enforce upon her this engagement. Their ostensible object is not to upset a European treaty, but to compel performance of a specific engagement. To this there is no abstract international objection, although it may admit of question in the present mode in which it is proposed to coerce Denmark by fully in accordance with public law. When, therefore, it was announced that Denmark had agreed to the most objectionable duty sufficient to enable her to consult the Bigsraad before replying definitively to the summons of Austria and Prussia, there seemed to be a clear prospect of a pacific termination to the dispute. The demand of the two German Powers, involving as it did, a change in the Constitution of Denmark, could only be carried out with the assent of the Danish Legislature. It might well have been expected that the Courts of Vienna and Berlin would favourably entertain a request to postpone their military entrance into Schleswig until the Bigsraad had had time to make the legal changes necessary to give the two Powers the satisfaction they had claimed. It was believed, moreover, that the turn of the Danish Ministry, under their disposition towards caution and moderation, for the thaw had put it in the power of a small but resolute Danish force to resist, in the first instance, double its own numbers with some prospect of success. And, finally, it was hoped to prevent such a collision which might possibly draw after it a European war would contravene the political interests of both the German Powers.

All these assumptions and anticipations, however, have been set aside by the event. The request of Denmark has been refused. Austria and Prussia hold to their intention of crossing the Eider as soon as their combined forces are sufficiently strong on its southern bank, which the military convention between the two Powers engages shall be done by the 6th of February. Some days will then be required to complete the preparations for the invasion, and unless the Danish Government, as well as his present temper, may incline him to prefer the longer game. He knows full well the advantage he will presently secure by leaving the King of Prussia to blunder on until he has driven all the Governments of Europe—except Europe—until, in the seeming interests of peace, and with the silent connivance if not the formal assent of England, that obstinate Sovereign may be repaid in his own coin by the military occupation of the Danish capital—not by France. Napoleon may, however, choose as the safer and more immediately convenient policy that of appearing at the last moment as arbiter in Europe. He may avenge the refusal of England to attend the congress he had summoned by letting the world see England baffled in her most strenuous efforts to purchase peace, and France able to ensure it at will by a single word. He may, if he gives any heed to the Liberal party at all, indeed, he has made up his own mind as to the course he will pursue. Men are beginning to fear that blood must be let in this portion of all quarrels, and that one, at least, of the two German Powers seeks to push on the struggle.

For the present, we have the satisfaction of knowing that her Majesty's Ministers are using their utmost efforts to avert, if possible, the unspeakable calamity of war. Whether in doing so they will succeed in this matter is, of course, not for us to state. But we must, if

The New York Legislature has passed a bill to enable soldiers in the field to vote.

A municipal report on the condition of the barracks on Broadway, near Astor House, has created much indignation. Sixty men, recruited for various military officers, were found confined in a room fifteen by twenty feet square. Many had been there for months, with no accommodation for sitting or lying down. The report states that they were covered with filth and loaded worse than wild beasts and that the existence of such a place was an outrage on humanity, hanging disgrace to a nation.

Admiral George Henderson died at Middle Deal, Kent, on Saturday last, in his seventy-ninth year.—Rear-Admiral William Allen died at Bank Rowers, Warwickshire, on the 24th inst., in his seventy-second year.

It is understood that, in order to give effect to its recommendations, the Commission appointed to inquire into the state of the barracks will recommend the erection of a military force of between 20,000 and 25,000 men, at a cost of £1,000,000 sterling, in addition to the yearly increase of £200,000 for the Army.

The committee ordered to inquire into the conduct of Surgeon Turnbull, of the Guards, in connection with the recent outbreak in the hospital leaks, has met, and the result is that the Surgeon is "entirely cleared from all censure in the matter." Some evidence is said to have arisen in some respects imprudently. It appears from the Lancet that the Commissioners, instead of sitting with a full board, appointed a sub-committee of the verdict, but ordered a second, which added the remaining forces.

A correspondent of the Hants Telegraph, writing from Gibraltar Bay, says—"I can assure you, from an experience of forty years' sailing, that I never saw the Channel fleet in better trim. We have now made a fair trial of her sailing qualities, and find that she can keep her station with the Mediterranean fleet. We have had some severe gales during the passage from Santa Cruz to this bay. About 9.30 a.m. our brave Admiral made the signal to heave to, and the fleet obeyed it in a most beautiful manner, which did a great deal to astonish the natives of Gibraltar. The fleet, under this stiff breeze, we soon ran the Admiral and Defence both down. At 12.30 the heavy firing and heaving to commenced, and continued for an hour and a half, nothing daunted, Captain Walsworthy, assisted by Commander R. D. Rich, carried out their drawing of the target, and at 2 p.m. we were under way the iron fleet was made of. She acted remarkably well, and, having once obtained a fair bowl-way, was as steady as a rock. Her speed is 12½ knots, and her size—split two fits, steamds, forestpail, carried away jibboom, and sprung mainyard—quite enough for one day. I am sorry to say there is an idea a dock, quite contrary to all expectations of so heavy an iron ship."

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The official annual return of the number, name, tonnage, station, and every particular regarding the steam-vessels composing the British navy has been issued, together with the horse-power and armament of each, published under the authority of the Admiralty, and compiled from the Navy List of January.

The total strength of the effective ships of the Navy on Jan. 1 was 373 of all classes, and 39,000 men and boys. Of these 167 ships, with 16,000 men, were at home and abroad, the whole of which will be specially converted into armour-clads. There are also 206 unarmed steamers, and a large fleet of sail and wooden mortar-boats laid up at Chatham. Of this number there are 72 iron-plated ships, 10 of which are armed with rifled guns. The largest class of vessels of war are the 40 screw-ships of the Warrior class, and other 40 carrying an armament of from 32 to 40 guns each, and the rest are wooden screw-ships, two-decked and single-decked, and a few paddle-wheel frigates with high-pressure engines, each of 60-horse power. The total number of guns on board the entire fleet is 3,000, and the total horse-power of the world is upwards of three hundred, the remainder being attached to the dockyards or employed in the Coastguard service. The Warrior class are the largest vessels in existence, and are the most powerful armed ships in the world.

During the past year the following vessels were launched and launched:—The Achilles, 4,000 tons, 1,250-horse power, Captain Tarleton, and the Salamis, 4, 826 tons, 250-horse power, paddle-wheel steamer, at Chatham; the Bellerophon, 4,270 tons, 1,250-horse power, armour-plated frigate, at Devonport; the Sexcarb, iron-cased ship, 4, 1251 tons, and 600-horse power, at Pembroke; the Hotspur, 1,850 tons, 400-horse power, at Blackwall; the Hector, 32, ironclad, 4003 tons, 800-horse power, at Glasgow; the Valiant, 4,063 tons, 1,250-horse power, at Millwall; the Ocean, 3,721 tons, 1,250 tons, 800-horse power, iron troop-ship, at Millwall; and the Waterwitch, 1,000 tons, 300-horse power, at Deptford, on the Thames.

During the past year the following vessels were commenced and launched at home and abroad, the whole of which will be specially converted into armour-clads:—The Research, 3,765 tons, 600-horse power, at Sheerness; the Enterprise, 3,765 tons, 600-horse power, at Chatham; the Pallas, 3,765 tons, 600-horse power, at Chatham; the Favourite, 3,765 tons, 600-horse power, at Chatham; the Active, 3,765 tons, 600-horse power, at Pembroke; the Arrogant, 3,765 tons, 600-horse power, at Devonport; the Furious, 3,765 tons, 600-horse power, at Devonport; the Ariadne, 2,359 tons, 400-horse power, at Pembroke; the Amphion, 2,359 tons, 400-horse power, at Pembroke; the Leander, 2,359 tons, 400-horse power, at Pembroke; the Aurora, 2,359 tons, 400-horse power, at Pembroke; the Minotaur, 10,600 tons, 1,250-horse power, at Blackwall; the Agincourt, 10,600 tons, 1,250-horse power, at Blackwall; the Northumberland, 10,600 tons, 1,250-horse power, at Blackwall; the Sultan, 9,210 tons, 800-horse power, at Chatham; the Monarch, 8,000 tons, 800-horse power, at Pembroke; the Penelope, 3,777 tons, 600-horse power; the Immortalité, 3,777 tons, 600-horse power; the Shannon, 3,750 tons, 600-horse power; the Triumph, 3,750 tons, 600-horse power; the Nankin, 4,005 tons, 200-horse power; and the Tartarus, 4,005 tons, 200-horse power, iron troop-ships, at Millwall. MARBLE BUST OF THE LATE LORD SEATON.

THE English, though behind no Continental or Transatlantic people in pride of nationality, are not so remarkable as some of their neighbours for hero-worship. The sentiment is, however, gaining ground among us, and is especially observable in the ungrecedented demand for monumental commemoration. It could not, we think, take a more healthy direction. Sculptured or painted personal memorials of our great dead are the most natural expression of our admiration, the most direct means of preserving greatness and worth in our remembrance, and one of the most legitimate modes of employing and developing art, notwithstanding some discouraging failures. Still, however, the popular desire to raise commemorative effigies of various kinds often seems to spring from not very lofty or unselfish motives. The fame to be memorialised must generally be recent, or in some way bound up with clique or party. Were it otherwise, should we not, for example, have heard an immediate requisition for a public monument to the late Lord Seaton? But the chief services of this gallant veteran were rendered to the country nearly fifty years ago, and he survived the vast majority of men old enough to share or to take a more immediate interest in his achievements. However, there is a project on foot, though somewhat tardily conceived, to erect a monument to Lord Seaton, and the subscriptions are headed by the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge. Meanwhile we are glad of the opportunity of engraving a bust of this distinguished officer, though it is destined for no more public place than the great hall of the United Service Clubhouse. The bust, which is executed in the finest Carrara marble, has been presented to the club by the second son of the deceased, Colonel the Hon. Francis Colborne, C.B. An inscription to this effect is on the red-variegated Belgian marble pedestal on which the bust stands.

Persons who may have never seen Lord Seaton will, by a glance at our Engraving, perceive that a much finer subject for modelling is seldom afforded the sculptor. The contours of the head are regular, the facial angle remarkably small, the features well proportioned, yet strikingly characteristic and manly. In simple justice to Mr. G. G. Adams, the sculptor, we must say that we think it this the best bust we have seen from his hand, and the more creditable to him as a posthumous work. It has evidently been carved, down to the minutest detail, with more than ordinary care.

This is not the place to enumerate the important services of the late Lord Seaton, especially as they were chronicled in our pages (see our Number for May 2, 1863) soon after his death. The reader, however, will remember that, under the family name of Colborne, and commencing as a simple Ensign, the deceased Field Marshal served in North Holland, in Egypt, on the Neapolitan frontier, in Sicily and Calabria, and through great part of the Peninsular War. At Ciudad Rodrigo, where he was severely wounded, he performed one of the most gallant achievements of the war—carrying, at the head of the 52nd Regiment, of the detached fort of San Francisco. In command of the same regiment at Waterloo he performed, on his own responsibility and at a very critical moment, a brilliant manœuvre which decided the fortunes of the day. The column of the Imperial Guard had almost gained the summit of the British position, when Colonel Colborne, seeing his left endangered, ordered an advance of the 52nd. "The Duke" saw the movement, and instantly sent to desire Colborne to continue it. A French officer who accompanied Ney's column confesses that it was this flank attack which principally repulsed and crushed the Imperial column.

After the Peace he was consecutively Governor of Guernsey, Commander of the Forces in Canada (where he suppressed the rebellion), Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, and Commander of the Forces in Ireland. His illustrious and honourable life was terminated last summer, at Torquay, at the ripe age of eighty-six.

GANGES PILGRIMS PASSING A GHAUT.

THE road between Allahabad and Benares is literally crowded with pilgrims to the sacred river, a striking contrast to the quiet of the road between the latter place and Calcutta. They are coming from, or going to, every part of India—Thibet, and even Burmah. Here and there the crowds are so dense that it is with difficulty that you make your way through them. Our Illustration shows a party of holy-water venders passing a ghaut, or the steep, rugged incline leading to a ford or one of the numerous nullahs, or mountain streams, which intersect their road to the outlying districts, where they will dispose of the so-called sacred water to those Hindoos who are too poor to make the pilgrimage themselves, or are prevented by other causes from undertaking it. The water is used in offerings and other religious ceremonies, and is supposed to possess miraculous curative properties. It is taken from the confluence of the Jumna and the Ganges, the most sacred spot, where the small bottles are filled and sealed by the officiating Brahmin, and then deposited in neat partitions in the baskets. These pilgrims are regarded with superstitious veneration. They have made a journey of perhaps a thousand miles on foot by easy stages. As they pass a village or town, or a party of travellers, the air is filled with their shouts of "Bhom-bahadoor!" a watchword immediately responded to, and signifying "the brave God."

RESTORATION AND REOPENING OF ST. MARY TOWER CHURCH, IPSWICH.

ST. MARY TOWER CHURCH, Ipswich, was reopened, with choral service, on the 14th inst., after restoration. Two or three years since, when the Rev. J. L. Turnock, the present Incumbent, was elected to the living, Mr. G. C. Bacon (now Mayor of the town) built, at an outlay of considerably more than £1000, a new parsonage-house for the parish. He then proceeded to restore the church. About £700 was subscribed by other parishioners; but the bulk of the cost has fallen upon Mr. Bacon, the general outlay having been somewhere about £8000.

The chancel was restored some years ago, and the rest of the restorations are in accordance with that commencement. The material part of the work at present carried out refers to the nave and north aisle. The north aisle has been extended down the whole length of the building about six feet further into the churchyard. In the north wall is a very fine window, in the Perpendicular style, which is the general style of the restorations. The interior wall is banded with double black strings, and under the windows is a string of encaustic tiles, forming light figures under the window-sills, and darker under the spaces between the windows. The roof of the aisle is entirely of oak, closely wrought, with circular ribs and elaborately moulded purlins, beams, and rafters; and the ribs are filled with tracery. The oak cornice is carved with Scriptural inscriptions, on one side the texts bring types from the Old Testament, and on the opposite side antitypes, or corresponding texts from the New Testament. The ribs rest upon stone blocks, which will, as the work proceeds, be transformed into beautifully carved corbels. The window at the west end of this aisle is to be filled with a design in tinted glass, by Mr Henry Day, in the course of the restorations. An important and conspicuous feature in the north aisle is a memorial window, in accordance with the style of the windows with which it ranges. The inscription at the foot of the lights is as follows:—"In memory of Herbert Wilkinson Cobbold, born Aug. 8 baptised Aug. 30, 1835; died May 9, 1862, on board the H. E. I. C.'s steamer Zenobia, in the Gulf of Martaban, East Indies." This inscription refers to a son of Mr. J. C. Cobbold, M.P., and the window is inserted by his memory by the brothers and sisters of the deceased. The design is the baptism of our Saviour on one side, and His walking on the sea on the other side, the central piece being the Resurrection. This window was by Mr. Wailes, of Newcastle. A lofty new chancel-arch has been raised, and a new high-pitched roof has been built on the clerestory walls. It is an open timber roof, all of oak, panelled, and finely moulded, with spandrils and tracery and unfinished stone corbels, as in the aisle, with a stone string under the windows. The clerestory windows are delicately tinted. The large west window of the nave is of five lights, which will be ultimately filled with coloured glass. At present the benching of the church is only temporary. The floor where the seats stand is boarded, but the remainder has not yet been laid with the encaustic tiles designed for it. The south wall remains to be transformed into a counterpart of the north wall, and it is intended to remove the south porch, and to do great works to the tower, leaving the south aisle corresponding with the north. A handsome altar-cloth of crimson velvet, trimmed with gold lace and fringe, has been supplied to the communion-table: the central design is the Agnus Dei, supported with sacred monograms and other adornments. The super-altar is painted with quatrefoils, sacred monograms, and cosses; and upon it are placed two splendid candlesticks with candles, upon which are fixed the Alpha and Omega.

The outside of the church is at present a motley mixture of the exquisite fresh work of the restoration and the dim, dilapidated rubble of the old structure. The roof of the nave, however, is finished, or nearly so; and the fabric of the north aisle and that of the west end of the nave are completed, although a great amount of decorative work remains to be executed. Mr. R. M. Phipson was the architect.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1864.

A CURIOUS trial which has recently taken place deserves mention in a journal of which Art is a very prominent feature. The revelations made upon the occasion in question, though they have little value directly for those who are engaged with London life, will probably interest many who have the happiness of living in a purer atmosphere, and yet may be occasionally the dupes of practices from those which were exposed in court. Such cases are not a good many persons who have been in the habit of buying pictures upon the strength of faith in auctioneers, and have complacently transferred names given in catalogues from such lists to the gilt frames of dining-room pictures, have their cosiest cosmic sensory feelings since the case to which we refer came under the notice of a jury.

A young provincial attorney wished to buy some pictures, and if he had not stated that he did not wish to be "humbugged," it would have been no business of ours to speculate upon the object of the purchase. Only, as one usually goes to a lawyer for advice on much more prosaic matters than fine art, and as he is generally thought to be conversant with the distinctions of (and fair copies of) passages from the works of Mrs. Jameson, Dr. Waagen, and others, and taking your instructions to attend an auction, and generally . . . Ha, ha! . . . Ahem! Possible that the attorney was the victim of those gentlemen who are good enough to advance money to other gentlemen: but, being of a considerate and philanthropic nature, and knowing how apt people are to spend money needlessly, may we endeavour to draw a distinction such persons and extravagance the slight obstacle of a picture, which represents not only a pleasing scene, the contemplation of which may elevate the mind, but which represents a thing of value. But we digress. Let him not a picture to do with this part of the business, and we should have had nothing to say to it but for the statement of the solicitor himself.

He comes to London, attends an auction, and becomes the delighted possessor, on behalf of his client, of some pictures, for which he pays between one and two hundred pounds. Some of them bear very good names indeed, and the lawyer may have wondered that the vendor should have allowed him to make such capital bargains. He bears them away in triumph, and doubtless the next entry in the attendance-book had something of a jubilant character. But on consideration, when the first flutter of pleasure had subsided, grave suspicions seem to have arisen, and the works of art were submitted to examinations which had an unpleasant result. Conviction forced itself upon the mind of the purchaser that, however meritorious the works might be, (and probably human nature was strong enough to forbid his thinking that what had pleased his own eye could be bad), they were not from the hands of the artists whose great names they bore. Finally—and this is the point—he brought an action at law against the vender, and declared that deception had been practised.

Into the more sordid details of the trial we have no intention to go. Everybody knows that very queer people get a living in London in very queer ways, and a long chapter might be written upon the secret history of art-manufactures in London and in Paris. While we write we have no doubt that many an inventive brain is busily and prosperously at work at a blush on his dining-room walls, and wishes that the picture-dealer who has undertaken to procure from the Borgia palace or the Orsini Collection the Borgia cabinet that will exactly fill the vacant space would make haste, and that the estimable dealer in question has been round to the artist near Soh's, who is painting the picture, and has urged him to "put on the steam" and finish it as speedily as possible. One hears that many very industrious young ladies get a living by forging eggs—that is to say, by painting easily obtained eggs into the likeness of rare ones—for curious cabinets of collectors. And how autographs are written, stained, dittied, slightly torn, carefully mounted, and well sold, is known to many persons who profited and lost by such little transactions. People will live, and it is of no use telling them that you do not see the necessity of their so doing while they have the means of improving the shining hour. There is no imputation of this kind in reference to the purchases by our young friend, though but one curious circumstance came out, which was gratifying inasmuch as it showed how the love of high art has penetrated to the humbler classes. It was shown that auction-rooms, when sales are going on, are attended by great numbers of poor men, who have been so softened and refined by frequent gazing upon beautiful pictures that they will forego the coarsest toil for which they seem suited and will sit hour after hour at a sale, and lose their enthusiasm for fine art carry them to the point of making bids against bidders of more prosperous condition. It is also pleasant to know that auctioneers usually hard, shrewd men of the world, whose only affection for poetry rests in the fact that poetry is fiction—are also so softened, in their degree, by this touching proof of sentiment in humble life as to regard these inferior devotees of art with the liquid most acceptable to them, and to send them home not quite empty-handed—though half a crown is not much, regarded from a worldly point of view—to talk of Raleen and Rembrandt to wife and children. It seems that the interests of art do not suffer by this tender generosity: for wealthy purchasers, in emulation of the enthusiasm of the humble worshippers, are indeed to give far larger sums than the works might seem to be worth, or, indeed, are subsequently found to be worth. But the moral is the same.

But there is another curious phase of art-life. Our indignant legal virtuoso was met by a prompt denial that he had been deceived, in regard to the names of artists. It was affirmed, and we may say proved, that a Morland was by a Morland, and another work by an artist of the great name it bore. The ugly truth was brought out that the purchaser had not to be the painters, but comparatively unknown ornamentists of our own time. It was not the fault of these gentlemen that they happened to bear the same names (for nearly) as the painters of other days. This part of the defence was as complete as it was ingenious, and we lament that a prosaic box of British lawyers was unable to appreciate the delicate finesse of the learned. Not that the jury were to blame for the error of the lawyer. It was shown that some of the pictures he had bought were good ones, or, at all events, that they fetched good prices; but a very large portion of the sum he had paid was considered to be extravagant by him. It is a pity that such cases are so cold-hearted and unimaginative. But what can be done? The Judge by no means summed up dead against the vender: on the contrary, although the Judge is one of whom we are all proud, it did seem as if the impression of the defence somewhat commended itself to the legal mind. But the obstinate jury would not be poetical, and the attorney won the day.

Two considerations present themselves on the mind. One, of course, is that parents who desire to see their sons prosper had better get a list of all the good painters who have lived, and see whether they themselves bear the name of any of these great artists. The next thing is to take care and baptise their sons correctly by the Christian names of the painter who may be selected as the tutelary genius of the family, and by no means to call a little Master Reynolds Peter, or a little Miss Joshua. This preliminary matter arranged, the next thing is to give the fortunate youth an artistic education. There need be no nervousness about it. Supposing a good painter—Landseer, for example. He will be able to paint a Joshua Reynolds or a Peter Lely, and, moreover, with a perfectly good conscience, to swear that it is one. His modest fortune appears to us to be secure. Such a speculation is of a very safe and practical nature that we hardly like to bring it forward, but will do so in the fewest words. It is that people who know nothing about pictures had better know something about the people from whom they buy those articles of furniture.

"WINTER."

THE sun is sinking in the wintry sky,
And all the landscape lies o'erspread in snow;
The day is dying, and to rest it lie
Some village-maid ago, who weeds the fading glow.

Age looks forth wistfully, and longs to go
There gently, silently, to ponder on the past;
Youth, full of hope, unconscious of life's woe,
Dances in pleasure on the glowing west.

Old age is weary—he has played his part—
Life's setting day is drawing to a close;
But spring is shining in the child's young heart,
Like the twilight gleaming on the waning snows.

The night is coming; but the morn is near,
When light, and life, and hope shall reappear

Louis Ulbach, who is also in exile, is translating the work into French, and it is said to be written with respect, with reverence for, but with independence of, the great genius of man.

The work of carrying out the adornment of the Houses of Parliament, in accordance with the decision adopted by Chichester Fortescue, has for some months been in progress. The drink consumed amounted to 1,000,000 gallons of tea, 1,000,000 gallons of coffee, 1,000,000 gallons of cocoa, 200 hogsheads of sherry, 50 pipes of port, and many barrels of ale and porter. The cost of the whole was £1,000,000 sterling.

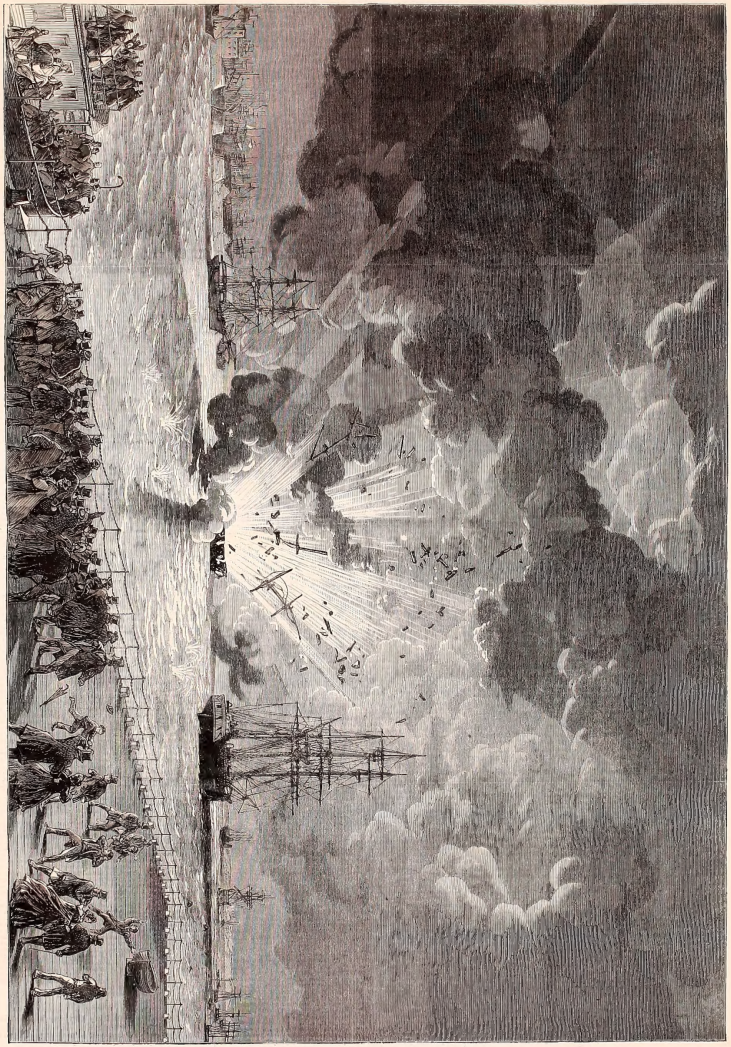
Active measures are being taken for the prosecution of the works of the Thames Embankment on the northern side of the river. A ten years' lease of the Middlesex Hospital has been purchased by the company, and machinery of a very formidable character has been introduced, upon which hundreds of men are employed night and day. The embankment, when completed, will be one spring on immediately behind the Duke of Somerset's house, and will be a magnificent structure. The roadway will be 100 feet wide, and will extend from Westminster Bridge to the point at which the west of Charing-cross Bridge, and preparations have also been made between Charing-cross and Waterloo Bridge, where the roadway will be 80 feet wide. An embankment between Waterloo and Blackfriars bridges, and that will be proceeded with without delay.

The Metropolitan Board of Works, on the recommendation of the Local Act and Sewers Purposes Committee, have resolved to alter the names of some nineteen streets, and to number the houses throughout the whole of the metropolis. The streets to be renamed are Bridge-street, Blackfriars, and re-numbering the houses, among which were the following:—Tidbury-street, the City; Bridge-street, Lambeth; Bridge-street, Westminster; George's-road, Holloway; Canonbury Park North, and Canonbury Park South, Islington; Bridge-street, Battersea; Bridge-street, Chelsea; Bridge-street, Westminster; Willes-road, Kentish-town; Sidney-street, Mile-end Old Town; Bridge-street, Hammersmith; Bridge-street, Southwark; Bridge-street, Mile-end Old Town; Barnsbury-road, Islington; Maltby-street, Bermondsey; Bridge-road, Battersea; Bridge-street, Lambeth; and Bridge-street, Islington. The applications from the vestry of Camberwell as to re-naming and re-numbering the streets in that district, and from the commissioners of the Sewers of Essex, &c., in Kensington-road, were refused.



Three of the metropolitan members addressed their constituents On Monday evening Lord Ernest Bruce and Mr. Harvey Lewis met a large audience at the Paddington Vestry-hall, and the former, during the paper was listened to with marked attention. Its interest was enhanced by the fact of a recent visit to the Federal States, and the noble lord's observations on the war, who came to the conclusion that the North would be victorious in the end, but himself made to the same distress as long ago as 1857. After describing the extent of the North, and the resources of the South, with the cotton and other timber, it was mined of Mr. Harper whether on the west coast there were any harbours by which the Southern cotton could be shipped, and he believed there would be most valuable in Australia. Mr. Harper replied in the negative, and added that all the harbours on the west coast were in the possession of commissioners between New Zealand and the Australian colonies. A communication from Dr. Hume, chairman of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and deputy-chairman of Lunacy, brought the proceedings of the evening to a termination.

Last week 1,172 persons died in London, of whom 559 were and 1018 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1854-63 the average number was 1,108, ranging from 1,172 to 1,044. The mortality of London last week was considerably higher than is usual at this period of the year, and was a remarkable contrast to the state of health of the previous week. The deaths registered in the last three weeks were 1798, 1617, and 1,169. In the same three weeks in 1863 they were 1,169, 1,109, and 1,044. The deaths was 1169, which, with a correction for increase of population, becomes 1124—being 44 above the average number in the corresponding week of 10 years. The deaths referred to pulmonary diseases (exclusive of phthisis) were 214, the corrected average number in the corresponding week of 10 years being 208. The deaths referred to diseases of the brain, nerves, and senses (exclusive of pneumonia are 148, whilst the average is 111. Phthisis, or consumption, carried off 127 persons, the average is 114. There were 99 deaths from diseases of the heart, including 86 from cephalitis, 72 from scarlatina, 77 from whooping-cough, 15 from typhus, 14 from erysipelas, 13 from diseases of the brain and nervous system, and 100 from diseases of the heart. 277 persons died from accidents or violence, 12 by suicide, 4 from poisoning, and 670 at sixty years and upwards. The deaths of eighteen nonagenarians are recorded, the oldest being 94.

LAW AND POLICE.—A singular case of sequestration of a benefice was heard before the Vice-Chancellor on Wednesday. The Rev. Mr. Gregory, Vicar of Corley, in the diocese of Worcester, became an inmate of a lunatic asylum in Warwickshire, and died there in August, on the same day. The insolvency process was completed a few hours earlier than the lunatic's decease. The Rev. Mr. Gregory's son now petitioned the sequestration of the living ought to be in favour of the plaintiff, who was the son of the late incumbent, and who had been curate of the parish for many years. The Vice-Chancellor said that he could not but have some doubt as to the propriety of the course which the petitioner had taken, but he thought that

"WHAT a large volume of adventures may be grasped within the little span of life by him who interests his heart in everything, and who, having eyes to see what Time and Chance are perpetually holding out to him, misses nothing that he can fairly lay his hands on. Thus far the pleasant and observant Mr. Yorick, the first of all sentimental travellers; and what he says is true. Of course the present is a dull week; there is nothing stirring, the jolly old M.P.'s wax refuse their experiences in the bee-window of Mudie's house (although at the Reg and Fanuli even the inexhaustible Lilley can't waning; and at the Gardens the theme of the new clubhouse and that of the Shakspeare Committee are worn positively threadbare—so bare, indeed, that both warp and woof are to be seen. Art is prospering; Artemus—not Ward—was staid to rest in Kensal Green; Punch emptied the pockets of the retail booksellers and left them as flaccid as those of his readers when he has done with it; the Pantomimes are rarer—literature, we may say, is almost prostrate. Society after its Christmas saturnalia, feels somewhat like a man who ought to be supposed to have felt after having swallowed its blanket. Digestion is one thing, but indigestion is another; and the former is perhaps quite accomplished, as the pantomimes still linger amongst us, we must not be surprised if, as they vanish, they leave a plaintive, "Oh, would 'twere!"

Nevertheless, there are signs of stirring. My Lord Palmerston has summoned his Parliamentary retainers, and will soon warn them not to eat of their duties but all to eat of the many luxuries of the session. As is usual, Rapet is fertile to her portrait as having a hundred tongues, has given a hundred different versions of the matters about to be "come off." The members of Lord Russell's spoken of as a certainty. A hundred members of the clubs declare that he has been hoodwinked, and that the Government declares that his policy is in effect German and not British; that he was "never so much deceived in his life," and that he is "positively shaken to irresolve as now"; in short, that old character given him ten years ago by one best brilliant of the Conservative writers, that he is quite true, when representing him as a page, "a boy in buttons," who replies for a minister, Mr. Disraeli, "I am not quite certain, but I am obliged to answer." I am afraid, John, you are much too small for the place." John, however, has been in office, and has shown himself equal to everything, carrying out the witty sort of the Reverend Canon of St. Paul's in the latter. In the latter, in the Germany, Sweden and Norway, France, and Great Britain, are in a kind of "dead lock." Russia, too, seeming mischief from all sides of it, in vain "essays" to enlist the sympathies of her cousins in the coming row; for we must remember that, pleading the reasonableness of the Duchies of the Duke of Augustenburg, it is clear that Russia, in the event of the further renunciation of the King of Denmark, claims for the Government of the Czar the Duchies, as Kiel and Altona would be prizes indeed to the great northern Power; and that Prince would pave an easy way to the Russian Crown, and such a preponderance in European affairs, that the balance of power would incline to its overweight. Then, too, Austria, Czernstien—he who remarked, by-the-way, on the very small portion of wisdom which was required to govern men, because they knew how certainly in what state they were in when they went into war, but none of them could know how they should come out. Cannot Dr. Bentone be consulted with what they are to come out of? Also determined to provoke another seven years' war? These are questions which cannot but be answered—perhaps—during the Session of next week, so new are we to the brink of the political precipice, may be heard there of the Government measures for the defence of the wrought-steel gun. The sympathy of the English seems fairly to be on the side of the gallant little Danes, who have fought their way with such good grace, and which has stood, with a very noble bearing, a considerable deal of battering.

It is not in human nature, at least not in that part of it which resides between Temple Bar and Bow Bells, to remain quiet for a week or so, or very nearly so, in great matters, we are engaged in a great many little rows at home. The great scandal case—not to refer to the violets here that—is not yet settled, and the Law Courts are full, and it must be said that the more explanations Sir George Grey offers the worse his case appears. Lopez's case is not yet proved, but abundantly proved, that if the brains and skill of certain legal gentlemen had not been purchased for the occasion—is not yet settled, and we may now have been an inmate of the not unpleasant asylum at Bethlehem where we have to perfectly understand the use of the Italian language. The man was educated, and a fair scholar, of a brutal revenge-full temper; his friends had to pay for a certain article, Bethlehem a proper appeal in a proper quarter, and escaped the gallows. Therefore three of us are fair for the Queen's Bench yet, as, awkward phrase and a good cry to go to the country with. Let this but be insisted on—as we have no doubt we shall—and there will be no blame—and more danger will be done to the country, in moving discord and hatred between class and class, than could be repaired by the best of Acts of Parliament. Mr. Bright is wise in his day, seeming he in reality possesses a homicidal mania, and is sane just before he rises to address his fellow-citizens at Birmingham or Rochdale. One of our cleverest doctors the other day suggested that men with homicidal mania are the very ones to be left at large, as the only maniac may slay one of his keepers before breakfast. "Ah!" cry those good people who do not understand the subject, "good suggestions, but consider the poor creature's family." We only wish, Mesdames and Messieurs, that he would consider the family of his victim, of whom some heartless photographer is advertising a cadte de visite as exposing the latest murderer's features. Fiat justitia ruat cœlum: Money, and money in any way, is the motto of such people.

According to many, Bishop Colenso—that arithmetical commentator—is a Bishop, a Bishop, indeed, in Africa, and has found him guilty of heresy on six counts. But to Mother Church Colenso answers that the servant of his Lord, Bishop Gray, has misjudged, told him "that if he (the Dean) did not know whom to had a good servant, I knew when he had a good master," and that he should refused to depart. So it is with Colenso, and, in all human probability he will be the stronger. The Bishop of Natal is not the first one only in name, and, it will be found, has little or no power over his recalcitrant priest.

The Conservatives are up and doing. Not only have they put forward some new names, but, as it will be seen by the division of the quiet souls who do not love noise, are about to start a new "organ." Luckily, the organ is not to be musical, unless it possesses the music of sweet words. The new organ, it is believed, will be not a daily newspaper, under the imposing title of The Rentals, which will be somewhat after the fashion of Punch, and somewhat in the proportion of being loaded with a mélange of short, pungent articles by non-professional writers, that is, Spiritual Peers, Lords, Honourables, Squires and noble Lords—some of the "mob of gentlemen who," according to Sir Walter Scott, "write with ease," and who, after a resting one writing too often—shall we say always?—is, can only pity her future editor, Mr. Copyer. It will be edited by one of the great cause with juniors just admitted, or drive the Oxford coach with a team of handsome colts, as just about to be admitted to the fashion. How curious it is that, from the time of Jonathan Swift and Joseph Addison to the days of the Editor's Room and Mr. Magins, and onwards to our own, the Tory party has never known how to run a one-sheet or one-penny weekly paper! It is a disposability of getting a number of men with brains—and these without are unique but salaciously—to write and to write well, and to write for hire are incredulous. Certainly, in our experience, the most "gentlemanlike days" of writers, as learned counsel, and the best articles and letters has known are precisely those who have asked the largest price for their copyright. The fifteen thousand two hundred and twenty-eight pounds which Lord Byron received from John Murray for his copyright is not a bad example of the figure at which "noble Lords" rate their service when in the livery of the Muses.

We hear that in Germany the Tercentenary of Shakspeare will be worthily celebrated; and that in France, or rather for Frenchmen, M. Victor Hugo will publish, towards the end of February, a new work upon Shakspeare. This commemoration book is, we are told, "a profound and exhaustive study of one of the greatest of men, made with respect, with reverent fear, but with independence." It will be affectionately dedicated to England, the home, for so many years, of an exile of European genius.

The pretty little quarrel between Mr. Bright and the editor of the Times has degenerated into petty personality, notwithstanding the proud eloquence of one and the undoubted power of the other. Here, then, is a caution for gentlemen not to quarrel; the bystander does see the fun—the word-combatants get the worst of it. Of what interest can it be to us but the scandalous gossip of Mr. Bright's and Delane spends his "leisure hours in town" in haunting "the drawing-rooms of the great," or he listens to the many recriminations on the part of the editor that the Quaker statesman "devotes his hours of relaxation to the smoking-room of the House of Commons or the billiard-room of the Reform Club"? Who cares for such encounters, whether do we hasten? No wonder a prize has been offered for the best recipe for curing the bore! The Duke of Argyll is to be the judge. Will anybody write a very interesting but very cal book or paper on the bore? Perhaps Mr. Dickens will do it, for he says that "there lies all that he had written of his latest and last story . . . the report of something to be done, something to be undertaken, and a certain loving picturesqueness blending the whole. I believe I am right in saying that I have in my hands the last words of a writer which must have cost him extreme distress, and which is a master-piece." Between the two lights I touched with a pencil as lovingly and as tender as ever a father caressed his child with. There is something very touching in the "last words" of a writer. Thackeray, it appears, had carried the MSS. about, and often taken them out to look at them, and to add a touch or two. The last words he corrected in print were, "All my heart throbbed with an exquisite pain." Mr. Dickens's last words, "I am," and then he said "that on that Christmas Eve when he laid his head back on his pillow and there was no scene, no love, no friendship, no kindness, no unselfconsciousness of duty done, and Christian hope throughout life humbly cherished, may have caused his own heart so to throb when he passed away to the immortal shore." Let us hope it may. Perhaps when a cynical people talk, as they often do, of the quarrels of authors, of their eager bickerings, and their envy of each other, they will remember some of the sweet words uttered and good service done by the contemporaries of the dead, and will be more charitable and less successful brothers of the pen. If ever such a chronicle should adorn the pages of a book, it will be that which will tell of the last days of Charles Dickens will shine brightly by the side of Swift, writing to Stella, and Addison to Lady Warwick, and Sir Walter to Lady Scott, sending a Grub-street bard; and of badly Samuel Johnson, with his fifty prefaces, written to advance the fortunes of his weaker contemporaries in the great battle of the books.

PHOTOSCULPTURE.—The last number of Les Mondes contains an account of a process by which, it is said, we may be able to obtain by shedding statues and statuettes mechanically. The person to be copied has his head surrounded by a number of cameras, and photographic impressions are made for the instantaneous production of twenty-four photographs, which are afterwards used for the production of the statuette required.

THALLIUM.—In analysing the mineral waters of Nauheim Professor Lamont has discovered the existence of lithia, rubidia, caesia and potassium, accompanied by a certain quantity of chloride of sodium and traces of bromine, iodine, fluorine, boracic acid, and silica. To obtain the last, a solution of the substances freed from the mother liquor a quantity of chloride of platinum sufficient to precipitate the potassium. A yellow salt was thus obtained, which, after having been boiled three or four times in water, was decomposed by a current of sulphuretted hydrogen. The sulphuret of platinum thus obtained was dissolved in aqua regia, and evaporated. M. Reitzer thinks that thallium ought to be ranged with the alkaline metal and not with aluminium and the earthy metals. In 1861, when he discovered the existence of thallium, he proved that the metal may often be found in the materials or products of the manufacture of sulphuric acid. Professor Lamont, of the Royal Institution on the 22nd inst., Mr. Crookes exhibited an ingot of thallium obtained from the flue-dust of sulphuric acid.

THE ENVELOPES OF THE SUN AND HIS SPOTS were the subject of a lecture by Mr. Proctor at the meeting of the Royal Astronomical Society. The mottled surface of the sun can be seen with a low power. The spots are depressions, and the mottling is due to flames in many ways; but he stated that he had not been able to verify the appearance of the "willow leaves" described by Mr. Nasmyth. He had, however, found, from Herschel's words, "the surface is like some fleecelent chemical precipitate on a quiescent fluid," that it is not a fluid, but consists of solid matter. When Mr. Dawes used a very small perforation, with an eyepiece of high power, he found that the sun's surface was composed of granules, and in the vicinity of the spots it was seen that these granules were arranged in curves, and that the surface at the margin resembled small bits of straw floating in water. Mr. Proctor explained that the spots are formed by cooling, the black centres distinction ought to be made between the umbra and the penumbra, and that the penumbra is the result of the cooling action which determines the origin of the spots. An account of the interesting discussion which followed the reading of the paper will be found in the forthcoming Monthly Register for January.

THE PRACTICAL APPLICATION OF THE SLAKING OF QUICKLIME has been proposed by Dr. John Davy (brother of Sir Humphry) in the paper read by him before the Royal Institution on the 15th inst. The steam of hot water is added to and absorbed by well burnt lime fresh from the kiln as powder, with the production of much heat and steam. This does not take place with lime which has been exposed to the air for a day, or two or three days; during which the lime gradually absorbs a little water. With the view of applying the expansive power of steam, Dr. Davy made experiments, which showed the explosive power of the lime when placed in a close vessel, and water added to it in a small quantity at a time. In one of these experiments, a cylinder of lime was made to open the safety valve loaded with 40 lbs. to the square inch. Dr. Davy suggested the application of the explosive force of lime to the blasting of rocks in mining operations. He found that a small hole bored in the rock, and boring was made in a block of sandstone about fifteen inches deep and two inches in diameter, filled with lime, and water poured upon it, and the hole was closed by a plug of wood. No rending ensued, although the hybrid was left for a day. Other experiments were made with iron vessels, and the steam was condensed. A second experiment was made, substituting for the lime a mixture of lime and sawdust, and the effect was found to be greatly increased. Dr. Davy suggested that the lime should be ground down finely by a cotta. After about fifteen minutes an explosion took place, with the bursting of the vessel. Dr. Davy thinks that the explosive force of boring was made in a block of sandstone about fifteen inches deep and two and three-quarter inches in diameter, filled with lime, and water poured on, and the hole was closed by a plug of wood. No rending ensued, although the hybrid was left for a day. Other experiments were made with iron vessels, and the steam was condensed. A second experiment was made, substituting for the lime a mixture of lime and sawdust, and the effect was found to be greatly increased. Dr. Davy suggested that the lime should be ground down finely by a cotta. After about fifteen minutes an explosion took place, with the bursting of the vessel. Dr. Davy thinks that the explosive force of some of them were projected many yards from the spot. Now, as coal is not always procurable in mountainous districts, Dr. Davy expresses the hope that the experiment may be repeated in a colliery. If it succeed, it will be a great saving of gunpowder, and much less danger; and, should it be successful, it may conduce to the saving of many human lives.

THE REPLACEMENT OF SPECIES in the colonies and elsewhere by species introduced from Europe is the subject of the 4th of the Natural History Review. We learn that in Australia and New Zealand the many train of English emigration is not more surely doing its work than the stealthy tide of English weeds, which are creeping over the waste and cultivated ground. Of the 54 species of flowering plants found in a garden in Auckland, 32 are exotic. Cow-grass, dock, sow-thistle, watercress, &c., grow everywhere, while young native vegetation appears to shrink from competition with the vigorous intruders. The rapid propagation of European animals is no less remarkable. Mr. J. Hunt, the Government geologist at Canterbury, in New Zealand, has written to Mr. Darwin as follows:—"The native (Maori) saying is, 'as the white man's rat has driven away the native rat, so the European fly drives away our own, and the clover plant drives away the native vegetable before the white man himself.' It is wonderful to unfold the botanical and zoological changes which have taken place since Captain Cook set foot in New Zealand. Some pigs, which we had other and better ones left with the natives, have increased and run wild in the bush to such a way that is dangerous to keep them. There are large tracts of country where they reign supreme. The wild dogs are also very numerous. Some harrowing. Some Kaiun-holders of 100,000 acres have had to cede contracts for killing them at sixpence per tail, and as many as 2,000 tails have been sent in. Seven killed adventurers parties without any diminution being discernible. Not only are they obnoxious by corrupting the ground which they have in fastest herds for the kids, but also hamstringing fellow the ewes when hunting, and devour the poor lambs as soon as they make their appearance. They are met on the western side of the Alps, and also on the lower grounds on the eastern side, where more seldom fails, so that the explorer has to be constantly on the watch against them. Sometimes they are met in packs of from seven to twenty very large, covered by long, black bristles, and have enormous tusks, and are very fierce. They are also very cunning, and will occasionally escape and return to the attack. More interesting fact is the appearance of the Norwegian rat. It has thoroughly extirpated the native rat, and is being forced even into the mountains by the black rat, which is a large size. The European mouse follows it closely, and, what is more surprising, the Norwegian rat has even exacted to colonise the Australian Bush. Hedgehogs, too, have emigrated with other quadrupeds, cattle, dogs, and cats are found in a wild state, living entirely on the flesh of animals. Of birds the same observation. When it arrives it regards the thrushes of New Zealand, which seem to share the fate of the native rat. The European bird also appears to have taken to the Australian Bush. Hooky the utility, have carried it to seize and bonitos to their own island station.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL commenced a course on "On Experimental Optics" was given on Thursday, the 21st inst. After a few introductory remarks on the wave theory of light, he proceeded to explain the method by which this could be illustrated by Fresnel, the Professor, by means of models, explained the method by which Fresnel was led to conclude that to calculate the wavelength of any light traces through space (33,300 miles per second) from observation of the interference of two pencils of the same light. The Professor then proceeded to observe the interference of the latter, and by means of a delicate micrometer, which was shown to the audience, measured the wavelength of the light. He also calculated that of light to be 18,777 miles per second. The main answer of the lecture was the reflection of light—a subject of which Mr. Wren is now from the electric lamp was thrown upon a disk with a rough, unpolished surface, and was then reflected from a plane surface (being received on a disk, when the ray was directed on a mirror, the ray was regularly reflected. It was shown that the angle of incidence was equal to the angle of reflection. It was shown that when a ray of light was obliquely inverted; and, when two mirrors are so placed as to inclose an angle, the number of images formed by the reflection of a single luminous point between them is 360 divided by the angle. Brewster, about 1817, a definite number of images is produced, symmetrically arranged, the number depending on the angle at which the mirrors are placed. By means of a large concave mirror and the electric lamp, the point to which the rays of light converge after reflection (the principal focus) was shown to be beautifully shown; and it was also demonstrated, that when an object is placed between the principal focus and the mirror, a magnified image of the object formed in front of the mirror is inverted and magnified.

THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.—Lecture on Friday evening.—The Professor commenced his lecture by referring to the three conditions of water—as a solid, liquid, and vapour—and explained the method by which these conditions could be illustrated. He showed that water, when converted into vapour, he expressed his own conviction, founded on experiments, that water could be made to exist in the form of vapour without the presence of air. Another bubble of a gas always remaining behind. After showing, by means of the electric lamp, the formation of a transparent bubble of steam in the act of the rising of the bubble of air from the bottom—he expressed his opinion that water could be made to exist in the form of steam presented by the experiments made in relation to those of Donny, who had shown that in proportion as water was deprived of air it was capable of bearing a greater temperature without the vapour was formed. He then exhibited water, while between each layer the water another a temperature of 300 degrees, and showed that it was not until the necessary 212 degrees was reached that a narrow column of steam, with a vapour issued. If the water were boiled in an open vessel it re-absorbed air, and boiled in the usual way at 212 degrees. The Professor then illustrated water in entirely expelling air or gas from water by boiling is under oil in a tube. Another tube was shown in the possession of the water and the upper a column of oil, becoming smaller and smaller during its ascent, but it never completely disappeared. The Professor then proceeded to show the effects of nitrogen. With the view of testing the peculiarity of converting an absolutely dry gas into a moist one, he had previously presented to the audience by instance that a certain quantity of oxygen occupied the space above the liquid in a tube, and that when a drop of water was introduced into the tube the gas was found to occupy a greater space than before. He then proceeded to explain the relation to the decomposition of water by heat not the made of action in the laboratory. He showed that hitherto chemists had believed that when the fumes of a liquid being expanded into vapour by heat, without being decomposed or broken up into its constituent elements. On the contrary, He stated that close investigation into these interesting phenomena would probably lead to the discovery of new facts. He expressed his regret that he was unable to spare to continue his researches. He concluded with a strong protest against the practice of using the Royal Institution for the purposes of advertising. The illustrative experiments were prepared and performed by Professor Tyndall, Mr. Wren, Mr. Barrett, and Mr. Hetherington.

THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.—Lecture on Friday last before "Iron Man" on Saturday last the 23rd inst.). He dwelt prehistoric archæology into Europe during the Stone and Bronze periods. He first initial process our giving more than a recapitulation of Mr. Lubbock's copious discoveries. He then proceeded to show that the knowledge of the discovery of iron was not when mankind, in Europe and in Central America, used arms and implements of stone (as also mentioned in the Book of Genesis), and the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hindoo, confirmed by the Old Testament. These will show that bronze (in the Bible "brass") was known and used before iron. Bronze matters stated to have been more than 3000 years ago, and was being gradually replaced by iron. Mr. Lubbock referred to the presence of bronze articles in the Swiss lake-dwellings, and to the discovery of a bronze celt in a gravel-pit which was brought from Cornwall; and, at the same time, he justified the veracity of the Phœnician voyages Hanno and Himilco, which appear to have visited Britain from the expeditions of Sir G. Cornewall Lewis. He also adverted to the great antiquity of the Egyptian monuments, the pyramids having been 400 B.C.; Karnak, 800 B.C.; and Usirtu, 1100 B.C. He stated that iron was probably introduced into Egypt about 1000 B.C., and that hundred years before the Christian era, because the same commercial organisation which carried Cornish tin to the Phœnicians, also brought the metallurgical skill exhibited by the Britons. Strabo, also, describes the metallurgical skill exhibited by the Britons. Mr. Pengelly then described the Kent's Cavern, and the discovery of certain names, such as the Baltic, the Bolt, &c., as traces of an ancient connection between Britain and the Mediterranean countries. He did not think necessary any iron antiquities had been found which could be referred to anterior to the Roman period. He thought that the form of the knives and instruments seems to indicate that the knowledge of bronze spread from a single centre, which was probably Egypt, and that the Celts of Britain were not autochthonous. The presence of metals and minor differences were adduced as evidence that the bronze implements was carried on the continent to the various countries, when the horse, ox, sow, goat, sheep, pig, and dog were domesticated. He also referred to the existence of the bear, wolf, and wild boar in Britain during the Stone period, and to the extinction of the great wolf and wisdom stuff. After death the body was usually burned, the ashes placed in a cist, and a mound of earth and stones thrown over them. Mr. Lubbock gave reasons for thinking that Stonehenge and Avebury both belong to the bronze age. The latter was probably constructed by the Britons. Some of the mounds were not mere ravages; the Romans, whishing the strength of all their enemies, were able to overcome the south of Britain, and after everything tends to show that our island had a long, eventful history before any history was written, and that archæology rests on no baseless hypothesis, but upon strict scientific reasoning. The lecture was copiously illustrated by specimens from Mr. Lubbock's museum.

THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.—Lecture on Tuesday.—On Experimental Optics" was given on Tuesday last, the 26th inst., when he concluded his illustrated course of lectures on the wave theory of light, and on the reflection of light. He showed, by experiment, that the rays of a luminous point placed at the principal focus of a concave mirror, after reflection, is parallel, and that no image; but that, if the luminous point be placed beyond the principal focus, in the case of a concave mirror, a luminous image is formed in front of the mirror, which point is called the real focus. When the point was placed between the principal focus and the mirror, the rays, after reflection, were found to diverge as if they came from behind the mirror, but were not divergent. The focus thus formed behind the mirror, and having no real existence in it, was termed a virtual focus. He also showed, by the same means, that the rays were not all collected to a point, but were crowded on the surface of a caustic curve, which was formed by the rays after reflection. The reflection of the light from a concave mirror was also shown by the electric lamp. The Professor next explained the phenomena of "refraction." When a ray of light was made to pass from one medium to another of different density, it was bent through them; but when the ray struck the surface obliquely, it was bent, and the amount of bending was found to vary. The bending of the ray in passing from one medium to another is termed "refraction." The latter part of the lecture was devoted to the illustration of the foregoing principles and the examination of various kinds of lenses; and their use being especially shown in the camera obscura and the microscope.

MR. J. A. PROCTOR will give the Friday evening discourse ("On the Science of Colour") on Feb. 5.

The Western French Railway Company has introduced reserved third-class carriages for females.

The New South Wales post offices are transmitting to England at the rate of nearly £20,000 a year in money orders.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE "great expectations" which racing men usually entertained from the opening of the year to the publication of the weights for the Chester Cup could hardly be said to have been indulged in on this last occasion. Even the acceptances have, up to the present, failed to provoke speculation, backers being afraid to make a start. A handicap is, upon the whole, a very fair specimen of Mr. Topham's ability as a handicapper, and will be, when a second trial takes place, productive of extensive betting.

The Spring handicaps (with the exception of the Great Northern Handicap and Somersetshire Stakes, have now been issued; and as soon as the results are declared betting commences, and backers will be in the full swing of business.

The Flit grows a bit at 283 lbs. Mr. Merry's colt, by Voltaire from Thecla (175 gs.) was the highest-priced yearling. The sale realised over 6000 gs., a considerably better figure for the year. The first Thormanby foal has arrived in the shape of a chestnut filly by Mr. Drake's Forger—Oak Nut, the dam of Lord Clifden's Queen.

Among the recent deaths of turf and stud celebrities we have now to reckon Ben-Voirlich by Farnerley from Blink Bonny's dam. He was the property of Mr. Ulrey, and was considered somewhat of a popular cleak of the course at Kelso, who won its Hunter's Plate on him four times. "Ben" was also a great favourite with steeplechase spectators in his temper on the turf, especially if he was pulled out twice in one day.

A correspondent of the Field thus writes his experience of iron fencing, which, after four running on the Hampton Court Station and coming on":—I have fixed wire fencing to a considerable extent, and much prefer that I ever used it. Iron fencing is objectionable from being against it, and handing and breaking the upright, and stretching the wire very much, unless it be done with iron posts (which are an expensive process), or with iron sales well rammed in solid ground, the stability of the fence can never be relied upon. Iron is, moreover, also an annual cost of paint or varnish. That for hurdles, though more expensive, are very preferable to iron fencing."

The Derwin had all the best of the betting on the three principal stakes at the Ameicale Club. Scorpion and Locusa Tevera, the winner and runner-up in the Ameicale Stakes, were both by Mr. Ten Broeck out of Bluff King Hal and Salisbury, the winners of the Hendley Stakes and the Veteran Cup. In the latter race Mr. Ten Broeck won in two courses, and 3 to 1 was laid on her before she was beaten by Lady. The Waterloo Cup entries comprise a number of fresh candidates from Scotland, and seven from Ireland. Mr. Westropp's debut as judge at the Ladies' Kennel Club meeting at the Agricultural Hall.

The Duke of Cleveland's death has left no blank in the M. F. H. list, as he had resigned in 1861, just previous to completing the forty-first year to both the Harworth and the Durham county packs, which divided his country. His father's taste for racing had not descended to him, but "Harry" was the last black sheep of the family that established in the present Duke's hands, and since Hapsburg's day they have never had a winner to victory by a long way. Lord Derby's friend Lord Spencer's retirement from the mastership of the Pytchley is announced, but may, we trust, not prove final. Lord Spencer's name is talked of as yet to Mr. Tailby in Top Lecestershire. Earl Stanhoid has again appeared at the covert side with the Quorn, and has been heartily greeted. It is said that the forthcoming steeplechases at Melton will be on an unusually great scale, and that the Duke of Prince of Wales's name is foremost among the subscribers to the great race.

Devonshire and Cornwall have united to present Mr. Tedaway with a cup, and his name is to be given to the Cup Race, in accordance with the style in which he has hunted his country at his own expense for the last twenty years. "The fox-famine" in Ayrshire is a source of great annoyance to Lord Eglinton, and to the other masters of hounds. The nature of the country is sadly against the sport, as the foxes make off to the mountains when they are found, and are rarely to be seen of them. Captain Thomson, of the Fife, who has been laid up at Atherstone with the small-bone of his leg broken for the past few weeks, was out with his hounds again for the first time on Monday, but intends to rest a few days longer before he rides to cover again.

The Marylebone Club has already arranged twenty-three matches, and the Surrey twenty-four matches. The Gentlemen of the South of England Elevens meet at Lord's on May 16, and Surrey has matched itself against England, and against the North of England, and will play a home-and-home match with Nottinghamshire. A Middlesex County Club is being enrolled, as well as a County Club at Manchester.

John Linnell, Esq., R.A., the landscape painter, has transferred to the National Life-boat Institution a donation of £50.

The annual examination of, and distribution of prizes to, the children of the Stepney Union Schools took place on Tuesday, at the children's establishment, Old Church-lane, Limehouse, in the presence of a very large number of the neighbouring clergy, ratepayers, and friends of education. At the request of the guardians G. F. Young, Esq., one of the Poor Law Board's chairmen to the schools, addressed the visitors. A large Christmas tree, from which every child at the school received a present, was in the centre of the room.

Letters have been received from the Universities Mission to Central Africa to the effect that the little colony was in a most prosperous and in good health. The Bishop had removed the mission to the Murumba Mountain, about 100 miles from the coast, and was about to visit the head of the Zambesi. With the exception of the boys, he had not thought it expedient to take with him any of the natives who had been converted by the late missionary, Mr. Waller had resigned his post of lay superintendent of the mission, but remained in the country. Mr. Scudamore had returned to England, and Mr. Rowley has returned to England, and Mr. Procter to the Cape, both on account of ill health.

Her Majesty's Emigration Commissioners have chartered the Warren Hastings, 1000 tons, Mr. Archibald Campbell, commander, for Q. and W. Straits, London, for the conveyance of emigrants to Brisbane, Queensland; and the Lightning, 1000 tons, Mr. Thomas Brassey, commander, for Port Phillip, Melbourne. The Lightning is the fastest ship that ever sailed the line of July here, with 480 emigrants, arrived at Timaru, in the province of Canterbury, New Zealand, on September 30, 1863, without having had a single death, however, principally of young children, from scarlatina, measles, and whooping-cough, had occurred on board. Mr. Rowley, the agent for the Victoria Emigration Society have received upon paying half the passage cost, or about £15 to £16, of Lady Bateman, Lady Talbot de Malahide, and each, from Lancashire and Cheshire, and of fifty families from other parts of the United Kingdom. The nominal list of single women now amounts to the total of 431 per head to single men from the two counties desirous of emigrating to Victoria, on the part of the Lord Bishop of Manchester and the Bishop of Chester. Henry Moore and Co., Liverpool, sailed from the Mersey on the 20th inst. with the Lightning, 1000 tons, Mr. Thomas Brassey, commander, for Melbourne, with 377 emigrants, 177 single men, 127 single women, and 73 children of ages between the ages of one and twelve, and 8 infants.

The total value of the imports during the year 1862 amounted to £356,103,134, and the total of merchandise imported was £221,000,000. The corresponding amounts of exports during the year, and that of the year 1861, and the imports an increase of eight millions and a half, and for the year 1863 the exports were £139,742,279, and the imports, £164,763,952.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

NOTWITHSTANDING that the demand for bullion for export purposes has been much less active during the week, the supply has been so limited that the quotations have undergone no alteration. short, endangering their own people more than those in the steamer. Again the same gun fired, and with similar effect, the langridge knocking up the water, but nearer to the pits than to the steamer. The gun at the landing belched out again, and a jet of water spouted up alongside the gun-boat. She was at last hit. A broken rocket-tube fell on board, but without any injury resulting. The natives heard evidently dug up this projectile and used it as a charge of langridge. At half-past two the gun-boat had anchored, and the Maoris commenced the cannonade. The side of the steamer was in a moment enveloped in white smoke, and a shower of the fragments of a shell tore up the earth about the rifle-pits at the landing; another followed, and another, while not a movement was made nor a creature stirred in the native position. Now a sharp crack was heard in another direction, followed by a sustained hissing sound—the 40-pounder Armstrong gun had sent its shell from Wharegamarino, and it burst over the long line of rifle-pits on the hill-top. The steamer again fired and shelled alternately from the 40-pounders, the missiles bursting over every part of the position. The time fuse appeared rather short for the 40-pounder range, and the shells burst in the air, but its concussion fuse exploded the shell as it struck the ground, and a shower of earth rent into the air indicated the spot where it fell. All this time the natives appeared paralysed—they made no reply whatever from their guns. At length, from a point near the water, where a palisade had been erected to arrest the march of any troops that might attack the place from the Whangamarino side, a sharp volley of musketry rattled out, succeeded by another, and then came a general dropping fire from the whole extent of rifle-pits. The balls pinged on the steamer and pattered on the iron plating, one occasionally going through an opening, or glancing sharply off the cupola. No one was struck, save perhaps some man in his coat skirt or the brim of his hat. The appearance of the steamer—as she lay for half an hour quietly reconnoitring the position, without deigning to fire a shot or to return the Maori cannonade—was grand, and suggestive of the idea of the overpowering strength of science when in contact with barbarism. General Cameron and his Staff had now made themselves acquainted with the nature of the position; at each loophole a sketch was being made, while the natives expended their ammunition in vain. At last, to show apparently that it was not silenced, the gun in the upper line of pits opened out again; but its charge, as usual, fell miserably short. The steamer's head now payed off slowly with the current, and after a reconnaissance carried on within about 300 yards, for more than two hours, she left Meremere and its guns and rifle-pits.

General Cameron, pursuing his course up the river, on the 31st of October, saw that it would be practicable to land a body of troops on the right bank above Meremere, and push them on to a hill commanding the undefended rear of Meremere. Without losing a moment, he caused a force of 663 men to embark the same night in the Pioneer and Avon, and four iron-sheathed cargo-barges converted into gun-boats. This force steamed up the river, covered by the darkness. Not a shot was fired; the Maoris were completely outwitted. The soldiers landed at six in the morning, and in a short time were posted on a high ridge a quarter of a mile from the river. The position at Meremere was thus turned. There were no defences on that side. The troops, under Colonel Mould, C.B., were instructed to throw up a temporary breastwork to secure them against a surprise; and General Cameron determined to carry up an additional force on the 1st of November, so as to render the capture of Meremere certain. But the Maoris felt all the weight of the General's new method. They knew the weakness of the ground on the southern side, ground which they had neglected to intrench, and they showed their consternation, first, by refraining from an attack upon the isolated body under Colonel Mould, and next by a hurried retreat from Meremere. The waters were out, the rivers had overflowed their banks, and, taking to their canoes, the Maoris rowed away in the direction of Ante, and the Waikatos are the most powerful and numerous of the New Zealand tribes.

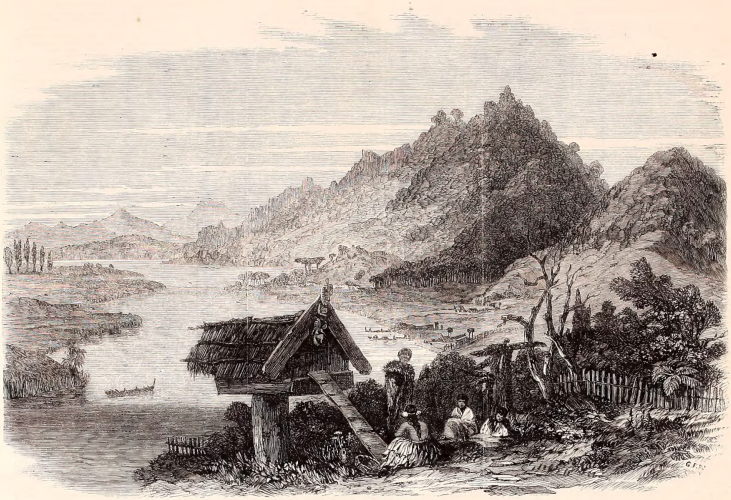
the Thames. Hearing a report of this movement in the afternoon, General Cameron embarked 250 men in the Pioneer, and hurried to Meremere. He found that the enemy had departed, and at once occupied the position.

THE QUEEN'S REDOUBT.

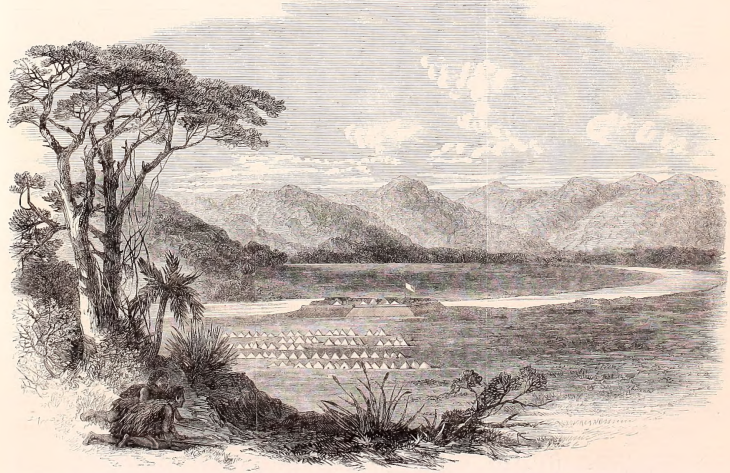
General Cameron's head-quarters are established at a redoubt about thirty-six miles from Auckland, called the Queen's Redoubt, and which will form his depôt for provisions and basis of operations when he advances into the rebel country of the Waikato. This redoubt is situated about one mile and a half from a river called the Mangatawarri, on the bank of which the party of seamen of the Harrier, under Commander Sullivan, who have been working the boats, have formed their camp.

The General has established strongly-entrenched posts on the opposite bank of the river, on the heights of Tauranoa, and an advanced post on a creek about three miles from Koheroa heights, called the Whangamarino Redoubt, about 2000 yards from Meremere, and commanding a good view of it.



CHURCH MISSIONARY STATION ON THE WAIKATO RIVER.

The mission-house of Peppe is one of the most picturesque spots on the River Waikato. It is situated on a rocky knoll, overhanging the broad river, not far from its junction with the Waipa, and is surrounded by green, mossy slopes, and glens of tree ferns, while dark and sombre forests clothe the steep sides of the adjoining hills. At some little distance, near the neighbouring native village, is the church, and farther on down the river is the pah of the renowned chief and Maori King, Te Whero-whero. All the banks of the Waikato are thickly peopled with the native inhabitants.



SCENE ON THE WAIKATO RIVER.

The accompanying Engraving, from a drawing made on the spot by Mr. G. F. Angas, represents the picturesque scenery on the Waikato, near its junction with the Waipa River. The Waikato here is broad and deep, and flows majestically along between alluvial plains of the richest soil, which are bounded on the right by the high range of Taupiri. In the distance are seen the mountains of Perongia, near Kawhia, on the west coast. The village on the river bank is called Waikanapa, and the district around has long been famous for its plantations of the "kumera," or sweet potato, the choicest vegetable of the New Zealander. In the foreground is a "patoka," or storehouse, in which maize, seeds, &c., are kept in security from the rain. Not far from this spot are the principal strongholds and settlements of the powerful Waikato tribes, who are the foremost in opposing British rule in New Zealand, and are at this moment carrying on their unequal warfare with a valour and determination worthy of a better cause.

CAMEL AND YOUNG.

THE baby-camel which is part of the subject of the accompanying Engraving was born about a fortnight ago at Mr. Connor's Prince of Wales livery stables, Hackney. Its mother was housed there at night with the other camels, forming part of Mr. James Edmonds' (late Wombwell's) collection, then exhibiting in the neighbourhood, and has been kept there since in consequence of the young one's arrival. As soon as the latter is strong enough they will join the menagerie. It is believed that this is the first two-humped, or Bactrian, camel born in England. This variety as a beast of burden bears the same relation in pace and power to the one-humped camel, or dromedary, that the cart-horse bears to the other breeds of horses. Dromedaries have occasionally been bred in England. It is interesting to watch the fondness of the mother for her little one. She calls it with a soft coaxing tone, to which the young one replies. In its gambols the latter often reminds one, by its smooth short turns and long legs, of birds of the ostrich tribe. The future humps, though shaped in line and fringed exactly like the mother's, appear at present as little lappets over each side of the mother spots like a lama when her suspicions are aroused by any undue interference with her baby, and would savagely punish any stranger intruder by seizing him with her large teeth and shaking him violently. When angry they both exhibit the toothless grin of the upper jaw. The children are very bold and adventurous at striking with hind and forelegs. When the mother is lying down it tries to jump over her and plays about in the cow shippon or on the adjoining heath-clad moor, or occasionally giving it an affectionate nibble. The young one is very fond of rubbing its head on any object near, and will bite at anything soft. It came frequently to our Artist to bite at his pages which he was taking down sketch, or to endeavour to use its teeth in certainty of tongue characteristic of its tribe, it would occasionally repay curiosity by a kick or an endeavour to use its teeth. When sketched it was only a few days old.

WINTER IN HOLLAND.

THOSE who have never travelled through Holland can scarcely form a conception of the peculiarities and characteristics of a severe winter in that country of artificial country. Artificial, because the entire land is intersected by rivers and canals, which form the high road for the thousands of passenger and intercommunication goods and produce by numerous cities and villages. In winter all these "water-roads," as the Dutch appropriately call them, are rendered impassable for the thousands of craft which, in spring, summer, and autumn, bear over their bosom the numerous cargoes with which the industrious and Dutch and German merchants. Then King Frost chains these water-roads as his own domain and territory, and throws over their surface a fascinating coat of mail, which lures to its glassy surface every man, woman, boys and girls, of all stations and all ranks—give themselves up to the winter sport peculiar and indigenous to Holland. From north to south—over every ditch and pond, over every rivulet and canal—skaters and sledges may be seen skimming with the velocity of over 150 miles. In the larger towns such fairs and promenades, skating and sledge races take place, such as that the Kattenburg, the Amstel, the Plain and the Y-sel, the Vye and the Vecht, are crowded with throngs of winter pleasure-seekers, on sledge and skates. Then it is that the rich and the rich in warm fun, the poor in improvised clothing of every description, are basking in the cool sunshine of a winter's day, which gives them. Many a bonnie lassie, hitherto left "to think unseen," then makes a conquest, and listens for the first time to "the old, old tale;" for no one would allow a pretty girl to skate alone, or not to skate alone while its own hand was free to help her on her slippery path, to fasten her skates or refresh her with wine.

THE DISTRESS IN THE NORTH.

THE condition of the cotton-manufacturing districts grows worse week by week. We learn from the monthly report of the Executive Relief Committee that, from the end of October to the end of December, the total sum of presses relieved by the boards of guardians and the local committees had increased from 48,000 to 60,000. At the end of December the number relieved in the month of January was stated to be 70,000, and it is likely to be considerably in the ensuing month. Mr. Farnell's weekly return shows a further increase of between 1000 and 2000 persons relieved in the second week of the month. It is deeply to be regretted that up to the 16th inst. not more than 2201 cotton operatives had found employment on public works. The sum of £90,175 had been received, and the balance in the bank was £205,172; two bales of clothing and bales of flannel had been sent. The following is a statement and balance-sheet of the receipts and expenditure from the commencement of the Relief Fund, June 1, 1862, to Dec. 31, 1863, which, though not audited, was laid before the committee. The total amount received was £1,000,000. Of this sum £1,000 was given by the Queen, £2,000 by the Prince of Wales, £1,000 by the Duke of Devonshire, £1,000 by Mr. Mudie, and £1,000 by Mr. Peabody. The sum of £1,000 was received, £1,000 by Mr. Mudie, and distributed in that form through the various local committees. The expenses of management, as shown in the balance-sheet, are £10,000, although it is said that is included the expenses of deputations, which had invariably been returned as charged by those members of the Relief Committee who had received them, and £445 for advertising. The interest allowed by the bankers was £17,000, leaving about £990,000 for distribution. Of this £90,000 and more were made—Hirst, £100; Charlton and Hardwick, £200; Holme, £300; Rimmer Brothers, £1000; Leyland, £1000; Ashton-under-Lyne, £1000; Preston, £800; Blackburn, £1000; Preston, £800; and some smaller sums to other places. The total sum distributed in Lancashire was £800,000, and in Cheshire £90,000. The sum collected in Coventry was £3000, and £2000 of that had been remitted to the distressed districts. The sum received during the last fortnight was £17,000. Of this £1000 was from Australia, £1000 from Paris, £1000 remitted by the committee was £3850—of which Ashton-under-Lyne had £1000 Glossop, £400; Hyde, £300; Stockport, £300; Bolton, £200; Oldham, £200; Bacup, £150; Blackburn, £200.

According to the last advices from New York, the report of the Commission appointed by the Navy Department to examine the plan of engineer, who have made careful experiments for five months, showing its practicability in using petroleum as fuel, and that the cost of steam generating steam, has been tested, and proves satisfactory. It is alleged that the use of petroleum as fuel will enable the Federal Government to keep up a naval steamer can keep the sea under steam three times as long with less labour and greater economy as compared with an equal coal-burning vessel.

M. Paul Maigron, a member of the French Agricultural Society, has just arrived in Paris, after a journey through various regions. Having carefully visited the southern province of China, and penetrated as far as Wu-chau-fou (the most northerly point reached by Europeans), Hankow and St. Petersburg, following the road taken two years since by M. de Bourboulon, the French Ambassador to China. The "Mandarin" oranges, silkworms' seed required in France is not to be found in the province of Tchekiang, as generally supposed, but in the mountainous districts on the frontiers of Thibet, rather, even, than in Japan. Nothing daunted by the failure of his first attempt, M. Maigron is at this moment preparing to start again with a view to obtaining the desired articles. The energetic Imperial Steam Navigation Company have resolved to the cost necessary to send their ships for the purpose to Shanghai, Galle, Aden, and Suez.

In the sitting of the Spanish Cortes, on the 12th inst., Signor Cartagena brought in a bill for the construction of a railway from Pamplona to Tudela, and another for the construction of a railway from Madrid to Cuenca. Signor Salaverria stated that the Government intended to lay before the Cortes, and that there were no extraordinary engineering difficulties in the way of its construction. He also laid a statement before the Cortes of the state of the part of the Government, but only an ordinary concession. The proposition was referred to a committee, and it should be added, to a favourable one. This newly-projected railway, it may be interesting to state, is to pass over the celebrated height of Roncesvalles, where the unfortunate rear-guard of Charlemagne's army, under Roland, was defeated and destroyed in 778. From there to a station in the valley of Ibaneta, where, in the midst of the knight of oil agree, will at last receive a monument in the shape of a marble archer's club.

THACKERAY'S LAST WORK.—Charles Dickens, writing about Mr. Thackeray, in the February number of Cornhill Magazine, says: "On the table before me there lies all that he had written of his latest and last work. It fills a drawer, and he put it there as it was completed, as he wrote—in its evidences of matured designs never to be accomplished, of abandoned purposes, of old beginnings thrown away, of fragments of new preparation for new trials—made of shaded lines and broken words, of the closing grain that he was never to reach, will be readily believed. The pain, however, that I have felt in opening it, is not to be described, in the conviction that he was in the healthiest vigour of his powers when he wrought on this last basis of his fame. There is no abatement of his sterling purpose, character, incident, and a certain loving picturesqueness showing the whole, I have felt as sure as I ever felt of anything, that he fully meant it to be so, that he had become strongly attached to it, and that he was pursuing it con amore. There is no sign in it of haste, or of any other picture which could have been sent him would have been in better time than mine. There are two children in it, touched with a hand as loving and tender as the father showed to his little child in death. They are as pure, as true, as precious, and natural, and pretty as the truth. And it is very remarkable that, by reason of the simple construction of the story, the two main incident usually belonging to the end of such a fiction is anticipated in the beginning; and then there is an approach to completeness in the fragment, as to the satisfaction of the reader's mind concerning the most interesting persons, which could hardly have been better attained if the writer's breaking-off had been foreseen. The last line he wrote but one, and the last he corrected for the press, are in the sixth number, and in so correctly made my way. The condition of the little pages of manuscript, where death stopped his hand, shows that he had carried them about, and often taken them out of his pocket here and there for patient revision and later invention. The last words he corrected in print were 'And my heart throbbed with an exquisite bliss.' God grant that on that solemn night when he laid his head back on his pillow and threw up his arms, as he had been wont to do when very weary, some consciousness of the love and gratitude here throughout life humbly cherished, may have caused his own heart so to throb when he passed away to his Redeemer's rest."

THE MODES OF DEALING WITH LANCASHIRE DISTRESS.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

ALTHOUGH I have said in a previous Impression that Lancashire will make no further appeal to the country for help, it must not be supposed that there is no want. Want there is, and, as an instance of it, I was told the other day that the Mayor of Preston, Lord Mayor's Christmas dinner in 1862 and last Christmas Day not a bit of fresh meat had passed his lips. What time is he hops in a renewed supply of cotton helps to free him from the door the wolf, which is ever ready to leap in. The Preston Guardians, the Committee of the guardians and the Central Executive Relief Committee, and their perfect organisation of both for the bestowal of relief.

As I am under no necessity to plead the cause of the distressed, I shall not waste time, perhaps, if I say a few words about the admirable mechanism which has been devised for dealing with the Lancashire distress.

The fund which a million workpeople were suddenly thrown out of employment, deprived of earning the means of livelihood, and cast for relief upon the charitable public of the country, and the number of parties who had to contend with it so ill prepared as was our Government when pressed by the Crimean war. The "machinery" running the blockade," as it was termed, occurred. Local committees, general, executive, and sub-committees, were formed, and subscriptions of landed proprietors, large employers of labour, ministers of all denominations—were established for the administration of the relief fund, the distribution of the clothing which poured in, and the superintendence of labour, &c. During last winter, when 48,953 persons were relieved in the week ending Dec. 19, relief was confined to factory operatives, but was extended to many who were the victims of the cotton famine. Before long, however, their local organisation is perfected, chronic cases of indigence, cases where the recipients of relief were found to be living in a state of habitually deserted, are relieved from the rates. The relief, both by the guardians and the committees, is given in money. In the first case, either from a general store or by tickets on shopkeepers. A third of the relief is generally given in money. The scale of relief which has been adopted is one which provides, on an average, 2s. per head for the whole mass of recipients; 3s. per head for adults, and 1s. per head for children. The clothing, if the family have been long out of work. The poor are allowed to purchase it at cost price, and Yorkshire cloth. Such a family receives 3s. per week. In these scales all members of the family are included. Single persons, if relieved, are relieved as separate cases, or allowed to receive extra payment for attending the sewing or other schools. Single men, as a rule, receive 3s. per week, as they usually referred to boards of guardians, and single young women are included in the same category as men.

The relation of the local relief committees to boards of guardians is simple enough of explanation. The latter are required by the custom for the committees to supplement the relief given by the guardians, trusting to the discrimination of their already appointed officers. The committees, however, are empowered to grant any relief they could cope with, and the consequence was a great amount of inquiry. Each case was visited by the relief committee, sometimes by each party. The practice is now gaining ground with the committees to order relief in kind—provisions, fuel, &c. The machinery connected with factory work or its immediately dependent occupations, such as the making of machinery, is supplied with relief in kind with by the guardians. The Central Executive advises that no supplementary relief be given to those who are employed, except for the strictest investigation and the clearest necessity. The visitors were at first voluntary, but now they are paid. The pay is given by them, nor is it left to their discretion to say what shall be given. Every visitor has a printed scale of instructions, and checked in various ways. Relief is usually granted for a month, but if in that period work is obtained, the recipient is bound, under penalty of losing his relief, to give notice. The organisation that has occurred in his circumstance. Schedules filled up by employers, presented to the relief committee, establish that the family that have full information of the income of the family from earnings. Each application for relief is filled up with the history of each member of the family, trade, present employer, late employer, total present earnings, and the cause of distress. The total average weekly total income from all sources, under a penalty of prosecution for false statements. The Poor Law returns of pauperism and crime in labour, is the basis upon which the committees grant relief. In all cases where it has been possible, it has been considered expedient, on consideration of health and morality, to find work for the wife for the relief given. With this view were established the sewing-schools, superintended by ladies, where the wives of the relief recipient for paid superintendents and attended by ladies of education and refinement, who have given their services gratuitously from benevolent motives. The women and girls here employed five days a week have been paid at the rate of 2s. per day, or 10s. per week. This is, and have usually been set to make garments to be distributed from the clothing depots. Many of the women employed have been educated in schools and taught; and in many cases the committees have paid a week for the school belonging to families in receipt of relief sent to school by their order.

A grave difficulty has presented itself to the relief committees in the matter of rents and house accommodation. It is not within their province to enter into contracts for work. In the dispensation of public charity, the duty of the poor devolves on the maintenance of health only. It has, however, been possible to adjust a scheme of labour by which the rent of cottages is saved for the tenant, by paying for work done by the hour at the usual rate, and not requiring more labour—work than will enable the tenant to pay his rent, and that of his family equal, at that rate per hour, to the scale of relief allowed to the family. Thus, if a man, his wife, and child go to the sewing-school, of any youth in the school, of any able-bodied man at ordinary work, the family receives 10s. per week for pay per hour, and no more hours' work has been required than was in the expenses of the family, for whom no labour could be found, the Public Works Act was passed. This act empowers the boards to employ labour on works of public utility. The wages earned by men put to work under this act are 2s. per day, or 12s. per week. The rent allowance. An piecework they can earn 12s. a week, sometimes much more. In such cases the committees refuse to allow any further supplementary grant, except during the first six weeks, or the period of training. The rent of the cottages, which, previously to the cotton famine, was £3 per week, is now £2 10s. per week. The rent of the cottages, which, previously to the cotton famine, was £3 per week, is now £2 10s. per week. The rent of the cottages, which, previously to the cotton famine, was £3 per week, is now £2 10s. per week.

FINE ARTS.

GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS OF DESIGN.

REPORTS of the resignation of several masters of the Schools of Design in various parts of the kingdom must have come under the notice of persons even slightly interested in art-education. The cause of the discontent which has doubtless existed in many quarters is the alteration of the minutes of the Committee of Council on Education. The aim of the old system was to award prizes or classes for drawing, painting, modelling, and so forth; and the master received premiums when his pupils gained such distinctions. But by the new regulations this is swept away, and a uniform "fee" of ten guineas a year is to be granted for the report upon the school, whatever number of grades the master may possess. The "free students" are also to be done away with by the Government in the same way as they are setting aside the pupil-teachers in a great many of our national schools. At the same time the English system of art-education is distinctly encouraged—a "payment by results," according to the number and proficiency of the pupils, is promised to the masters. There can be little difference in saying that in a great majority of cases this principle will be found not advantageous to the pupils, and in many instances unfavourable. At the moment, however, the masters naturally feel aggrieved that they are suddenly deprived of support through the particular channel from which they were led by Government to expect it; and in some schools, where the masters command sufficient space or scope to attain the counterbalancing "results," they will suffer a pecuniary loss. The change, it will be seen, are analogous to those taking place in the national schools, which, however, certainly like the new system for making the attentions besides the growing necessity for economy. It acted upon, it is an incontrovertible fact should only moderate to supply elementary education of any kind. It also felt the necessity of assimilating the schools of the Department of Science and Art with those under the Committee on General Education (in which so much has been done) in order to avoid unnecessary confusion from the latter. The change was, we believe, both desirable and necessary; but during at least a year or two it entails a hardworking and severe set of men most inevitably suffer.

The new regulations of the Committee of Council have, as might be expected, attracted public attention to what has been done by the Schools of Design all over the country during the twenty-two years of their existence. Before we enter on the details of the new scheme, it would appear that there has been a certain reaction against the system of general art-education. The Schools of Design we have sometimes been free in our criticism on the department of art, it therefore seems to us an unjustifiable severity in a popular current to try to ascertain whether wind and tide are likely to carry us into a port of safety. Mr. Cowper, First, then, we refer to a speech made by Sir Stafford Northcote at Exeter the other day and reported in the Times. Sir Stafford's views, however, contain very interesting statistics. Sir Stafford found that our general exports had increased in twenty years 80 per cent, while our exports at the end of the same period of those articles susceptible of greater attractiveness from improved taste had increased from £2,700,000 to £8,000,000, or more than 200 per cent in less than 20 years. We cannot wonder that, impressed with these figures, Sir Stafford should look to any means for the increase of the wealth of a country as commensated take root and flourish in the west of England, although there formerly existed a well-established Devonshire school, become a "black country." famous for its pottery.

Perhaps the most remarkable proofs of the nation's great advance in taste as applied to manufactures are afforded where, according to Sir Stafford, it is least expected. We allude to—namely, in the French reports and criticisms on our International Exhibition of 1862, and on the Paris Exhibition. Again in the Palais de l'Industrie at Paris, in the French official report on the Exhibition of 1862, our Gallic competitors acknowledged with evidently great surprise that in the year 1851, equalled, if not surpassed and surpassed them in some branches of artistic manufactures in which we had previously held a superior position. An article in the Revue des Deux Mondes, on the Paris Industrial Exhibition, is still more remarkable. "Let us," says the French writer, "at least taught us one important fact, which is that England has organised had surpassed us in application of art to industry." This result is attributed entirely to the establishment of schools of industrial design. "England," continues this critic, "possesses at the present moment 700 schools of design, and she has set it to propagate the love for art and taste. These societies number 200,000 members, which in their turn encourage the establishment of more than 2000 industrial schools. Museums of all kinds have been created for each industry, with public instruction and special lectures for the different kinds of manufactures. By this means England has been able to create her books, drawings, and engravings, which may serve as models and examples. This result is obtained with it a considerable amount of funds, and a body of intelligent men devoted to art and attached firmly to their country, ready for a proper remuneration." We are in 1862, in London, several specimens of the works of these new industrial schools of art, and we must acknowledge that if the statement was not so clever (?) as those of our schools, they arrive, thanks to the happy choice of subjects, at a more satisfactory result. Although these people commonly do in England, facility of invention and unfailing taste are rather exceptional qualities. It is not a little curious to find the French critic complaining that his compatriots are compared with the English, immediately declining, through the influence of the conception and the neglect of their elementary instruction. But it is not still more enigmatical that even some of those who should be the best informed on the subject are ready to express their fear, while claiming that France keeps ahead of us in every branch of art; that if we will continue to send our products to Paris, and to Manchester abroad for it; that our schools of art have done nothing, and have no actual result to show after twenty years' spending a large sum annually? drawings. Let us not sanction a lavish and unproductive public expenditure, but let us open our eyes to the fact that our effect blindness to the strongest presumptive evidence. We will not say dogmatically that the Government Schools of Design in which we have so alarmed our French critics is attributable to our schools of design. But this we will say, that it would be impossible to explain the processes and stages of fructification which the instruction (elementary as it is for the most part) of those schools has undoubtedly given to the human mind on the land. But if we cannot say these schools bear produced all the results of which we at home seem so ignorant, they have produced some, and a lot? The result is here, and we can point to only one visible agency. The harvest of wholesome views of art-manufacture, and we know that something resembling corn seeds has been sown. Our conclusion is that we had better be cautious in the condemnation of the vessel which may only prove to be a petty eddy of popular prejudice.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Court and Society from Elizabeth to Anne. Edited from the papers at Kimbolton by the Duke of Manchester. (2 vols. Hurst and Blackett.) Whoever contributes a fair share to the information already possess concerning the political, courtly, and social condition of previous generations, that we may be the better enabled to judge what progress or retrogression we have made, is entitled to the thanks of the community. These thanks have now been earned by the Duke of Manchester, who has rummaged diligently amongst the papers at Kimbolton and extracted from them an acceptable contribution to historical literature. There is certainly some reason for the hope which he expresses in his preface that "the reader will find what object he may have in view more than realised on the titlepage;" forasmuch as ten chapters, and two hundred and eighty pages, must be perused (or skipped) before one arrives at even the birth of the Virgin Queen. This long preamble is manifestly due to the unexpected success of the memorial illustration which the Spanish archives yielded to the explorer sent out by our Government." The consequence of the successful exploitation is, that Gondomar is by a high sheriff's warrant to be arrested, the editor would have been justified in saying a very ample) portrait of Catherine of Aragon, "Dona Catalina, Princesa de Gales, (so called (no doubt on good authority), would be a worthy theme for a biographical pen were the known only as having introduced into that country farthingales, the prototypes of crinoline. But she is further remarkable, in a social point of view, as having "brought out tested into fashion"—a fashion, however, which, if we may judge from the homely vegetable to which they are compared, certainly does not stands little chance of such a revival as we witness daily in the case of the farthingale. Moreover, the genius of Shakespeare and Bacon has impressed indelibly upon our minds the sadder fragments of her eventful life. When, therefore, the great archives of Simancas have been opened, and discovered Catherine writing her own strange story with the frankness of a woman who believed she was talking in secret with her mother, Isabella, the Duke of Manchester, to whose suave invaded, as it were, the privacy of the dead for the instruction and enjoyment of the living by the publication of letters and such imagines who required to be appeared as well as the sheer ignorant, who required to be instructed. Mary, Queen of Scots, and Elizabeth (to a great extent) account of the feelings which swayed and the trials which characterised them before she became the victim of a heavier bribe was the spot where an army halted; whose nursery was the camp; whose lullaby was the thundering roar of the guns; and whose yet scarce two years old, was put up for sale in her mother's room, where any respectable bid for her was sure to be successful. Successive Princess of Wales, a Queen of England, and a divorced wife, she was born unitary of Henry VIII., and died untimely at Kimbolton. A Duke can do a great deal for a family, but he can even secure the services of gentlemen so well known in literature as Mr. Heywood Sumner, Mr. Walter Crane, and Mr. Lucas, without the thanks for assistance which go expressly increases the interest of these volumes. The Duke of Manchester has a quarter of a million of his ancestors or namesakes appear to be, in some few instances, a little dull. Its readers must be prepared to encounter articles

THE NEW DEAN OF WESTMINSTER

ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, D.D., the new Dean of Westminster, is the second son of Edward Stanley, D.D., Bishop of Norwich, a distinguished naturalist, by Catherine, daughter of the Rev. Oswald Leycester, Rector of Stoke, Shropshire. Arthur Stanley was born about 1815. He was educated at Rugby, and was the favourite pupil of the illustrious Arnold, his friendship with whom was only terminated by Arnold's death, in 1842. Stanley obtained a Balliol scholarship, got the Newdigate Poem in 1837 ("The Gypsies"—the best Newdigate it is said, since Heber's "Palestine"), the Ireland in the same year, took a first class in 1838, and obtained in 1839 the Latin essay, and in 1840 the English essay, and also the Ellerton theological prize, he being by this time fellow of University College. After this Mr. Stanley became known for many years in Oxford as one of the most able of the tutors, and as one of the pioneers of "Liberal opinions" in Oxford. On his father's death, in 1850, he refused the deanery of Carlisle, tendered to him by Lord John Russell as a mark of respect to his father's merits as a Liberal Bishop; but, having been secretary of the Oxford University Commission and one of its guiding spirits, he was rewarded, in 1851, with a canonry at Canterbury. He returned to Oxford, in 1858, as Canon of Christ Church, the stall attached to the Regius Professorship of Ecclesiastical History, which he held, having fallen in. He had been select preacher before the University in 1845-6. His subsequent career at Oxford, as the leader of the Liberal party, is matter of recent notoriety. He was elected a member of the Hebdomadal Council in 1860. He was for many years Chaplain to the Prince Consort, and on the Prince of Wales forming his establishment he became Chaplain to his Royal Highness. He accompanied the Prince to the East, and has published a volume of sermons preached in the Holy Land, with some interesting notes of the tour. He is also examining Chaplain to the Bishop of London, and published last year a pamphlet in favour of relaxing subscription to the Articles, which he dedicated to his Lordship. Dr. Stanley has a high reputation as an author. His "Life of Arnold" (1844) is one of the best biographies ever written. His lectures on the Eastern and the Jewish Church, his loving memoir of his father, his sermons on the Apostolical age, his lectures on the Corinthians, &c., all show an eloquent style, a loving heart, and a candid mind.

THE VERY REV. ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, D.D., THE NEW DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

The installation of Dr. Stanley as Dean of Westminster took place on the 9th inst. in Westminster Abbey, and on Sunday, the 10th, he preached his first sermon in the abbey to a large congregation.

On Monday and Wednesday, last week, Dr. Stanley gave two lectures on the "Hebrew Monarchy under Solomon" before the Edinburgh Philosophical Institute.

THE EXPLOSION IN THE MERSEY.

We give on page 101 an Engraving (from a sketch taken by Mr. Wood, of Queen's-road, Liverpool) of the terrible scene in the Mersey, on Friday evening, the 15th inst., when the Lottie Sleigh, with 11½ tons of gunpowder on board, blew up; and below is depicted (from a sketch by Mr. John N. F. Macbride) a portion of the hull of the vessel as it lies, keel uppermost, on a mud-bank at New Ferry Birkenhead, whither it drifted after the explosion. The deck and stern are blown out, and the timbers in that quarter are much shattered and splintered. The vessel has opened outwards from the line where the deck was, the cutwater being partly smashed and quite parted from the timbers of the bows. In other respects the hull, broadside view, does not look so bad, as the leading lines, larboard and starboard, are intact, or nearly so. Looking into the hull at the bows, nothing is seen but a broken mass of charred beams and timber, crossing and recrossing each other in all directions.

This vessel, which belonged to Messrs. Hatton and Cookson, and was bound for Africa, was taking in powder from the magazine-boats off Tranmere, and had stowed away eleven tons, when, about six p.m., as the steward was engaged in the cabin trimming the lamps with paraffin oil, some of it exploded and ignited the captain's bed-curtains. Prompt measures were taken to suppress the flames, but they had already obtained the mastery. The knowledge that so much gunpowder was on board doubtless, to some extent, paralyzed the exertions of the crew. At length, despairing of success, they gathered together whatever they could lay their hands on, and were taken off by the passing Rock Ferry-boat Wasp and landed at the small stage. The magazine-boat also cleared off. By this time the flames had spread all over the vessel, and the news was circulated on the pier-heads that the vessel would soon blow up. Hundreds of persons awaited the explosion. When the explosion took place the spectators were panic-stricken, and rushed frantically off the stage and pier-heads. The spectacle which the event, not, however, without much trepidation.

burning vessel presented at the moment of the explosion was one of the grandest, yet most fearful, that could be witnessed. The flames had enwrapped the whole of the lower portion of the vessel, but had not caught the rigging. Suddenly a deafening sound burst upon the ear, and the black hull belched forth a volume of flames, which illumined the heavens, and cast its lurid light over both sides of the Mersey. The masts and yards were pitched high in the air, and, after a few fantastic evolutions, fell hissing into the water. Immediately the smoke had cleared away portions of the burning mass was seen floating down with the ebb tide. Of these at one time nearly as many as a hundred were seen. They were traced for a considerable distance, but eventually the lights were extinguished by the water dashing over them, and no mischief was occasioned by the burning pieces. A portion of the hull floated past the Woodside ferry-boat, that vessel being compelled to shut off steam to avoid coming in collision with it.

The shock at Liverpool and Birkenhead, and for nearly five miles round, was severely felt, and created indescribable terror. The moment it took place the earth trembled as though convulsed by an earthquake—the most solid blocks of warehouses, offices, and private dwellings were shaken to their base—doors, locked and bolted, were thrown wide open; and thousands of squares of glass, both in Liverpool and Cheshire townships, were smashed; while the lamps through the greater portion of the streets were extinguished, rendering it difficult to pass from place to place, and jeopardising the safety of those who rushed about to ascertain the cause of the consternation. Total darkness existed on all sides, and the noise and tumult on every hand increased the horror of the moment. No loss of life has been reported, although there were several narrow escapes from the bolts, which were thrown a considerable distance. Both in Liverpool and Birkenhead the streets near the river looked as though they had been sacked by an invading army.

PLATE PRESENTED TO COLONEL GORE BROWNE, LATE GOVERNOR OF NEW ZEALAND.

The gallantry of our troops, aided by colonial volunteers who have shown equal bravery and the determined and well-organized resistance of the Maori chieftains, have drawn upon our antipodes, New Zealand, the attention of the world. It is, therefore, with reasonable pretext that we engrave a portion of a magnificent service of plate which has been prepared for presentation to the late Governor of New Zealand, Colonel Gore Browne.

The career of Colonel Browne has been a very active, indeed, almost a romantic one; and a slight sketch of it will show in how many regions our hard-working soldiers are to be found at their post. Entering the Army at sixteen, Colonel Browne served many years with the 28th Regiment; and whilst Lord Viscount Combermere was High Commissioner of the Ionian islands Captain Browne acted as his Aide-de-Camp, and for some time as Colonial Secretary. In 1836 Major Gore Browne exchanged into the 41st Regiment, and served during the occupation of Affghanistan. He was present at the storming of the Khoord Kabul Pass, the 41st joined General England and advanced to the rescue of General Nott and his troops. During the whole of this arduous campaign Major Gore Browne remained with the 41st, and also commanded the reserve at the disastrous battle of Ferozshuhr, and, for nearly the whole war, the van of the army had been broken, was enabled to repulse the enemy and to cover the retreat. Colonel Browne received of his regiment at his battles of Candahar, Ghuznee, Cabul, and during the march through the Khyber Pass, where he commanded the rear, and was engaged in constant skirmishing from the storming of the Hill Fort at Islaleff, the most daring action during the war. Major Gore Browne's especial gallantry and humanity were praised in the General's despatches, which were quoted in both Houses of Parliament, and he received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, and the Commander-in-Chief, and a brevet-majority, and was made a C.B.

On his return with his regiment from India the Colonel exchanged into the 12th, and he could be considered as the resident Governor of St. Helena, in 1851. From St. Helena he went, in 1855, to New Zealand, where he was at the first unfavourable stage of the Maori war. On the breaking out of the Maori war, in the last year of his government, Colonel Gore Browne was made Major-General, and was honored by some persons, but which experience has shown to be the one thing needful, with the command. He was the right military gentleman, and was essential in resisting the land league and the Maori land movement. The Colonial Secretary of the present ministry has some of office, was succeeded in the government of New Zealand by Sir George Grey, and he himself returned to England as Governor of Tasmania.

The testimonial, which is very handsome, consists of a centre epergne and two candelabra, appropriately embellished with birds, animals, and plants peculiar to the country. It is of frosted silver, polished, and of the most elaborate design. It has been manufactured by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, of New Bond-street.

THE ST. CLEMENT DANES CHALLENGE CUP.

The prizes to the Westminster Rifles (the Queen's) were presented on the 9th inst. by Lady Constance Grosvenor, in Wodsmister Hall. Among the competitors were the St. Clement Danes Rifles, numbering, a large and beautiful vase, of the value of 60 gs., which we engrave. It was manufactured for the corps by Messrs. Elkington, Danes, and was won, together with a gold pin (the portcullis) and a marble clock-case, by the St. Clement Danes Rifles (commanded by Sir St. Clement Danes) company. On receiving the articles from Lady Constance Grosvenor, the corps was loudly cheered, and, at the call of Captain Scrivener, and a rifle telescope and £3, were won by Private F. S. Vincent, of this company.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

JANUARY'S feasts have been conspicuous this year in the monde Parisien, for the costly dresses worn at balls. At the Opera Ball, the boxes and soirees at the nobility's houses have been more than ever remarkable for the ravishing effects of the costumes and the richness of the materials. The luxury of some of the ladies' dresses is perfectly astounding: on entering a ball-room one would be led to suppose that the wearer of rushed talle or gauffred ribbon was placed so artistically that none but the initiated could detect the slight appearance of disorder. This style of coiffure is especially suitable for dinner parties and soirees theatrical en suite.

Without the slightest desire to announce the prospective defeat of the fashionable velvet, it is unquestionable that the introduction of the colour blue has become a serious rival to the tartan plaids. A sort of competition is consequently effected in the manufacture of the new cosacks trimmings on robes of blue silk, and the combination is not at all disagreeable; but the rich and costly velvet is the first favourite, and the favour which the above colour finds in the eyes of the Empress will in all probability lead to the velvet robe being adopted for many months has stood its ground against all comers. Sic transit gloria Scotiæ, for the moment at least.

On the subject of costumes we have only to call the attention of our fair readers to the latest style of feather trimming, fully shown in our first fashion plate which we have this week published, consisting ornamented with jet, are extremely fashionable at the present moment.

The general shape and trimming of ladies' ordinary dresses remains the same. In silk, as only mentioned above, the fashionable cracked robes are frequently worn for ceremonial occasions, when a profusion of jewellery and diamonds decorates the fair wearer, and the passementeries is without importance, and may be confidently left to the taste of the lady herself, as the present fashion allows of the selection of every description of dress ornament, which thus runs no risk of being disapproved as ridiculous.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress.—Dark brown silk robe, trimmed round the bottom of the skirt with a wide band of velvet, headed and finished off by a torsade of chenille and a narrow lace ruching. At an equal distance from the lower edge of the velvet band the trimming of the skirt is completed by a full ruching of the same lace, which, further up, is ornamented to match. Black velvet bonnet, enlivened on one side with velvet feathers, and in the interior ornamented with white flowers.

Fig. 2. Ball Dress.—The robe is in gros de Tours, of a white ground, with broad horizontal brocaded stripes. The flounces are trimmed with a gauze ruching, edged with narrow black lace. Each of the flounces has a similar ruching placed at the top, headed with a large bow. The berthe on the corsage is provided with a corresponding trimming, and completed likewise with a bow. Head-dress composed of pouff of mother-of-pearl flowers and a white rose.

Fig. 3. Evening Dress.—Black satin robe, trimmed on the skirt by a narrow flounce, composed of violet guipure and rucked ribbon. The corsage is plain, high-necked, and fastened with buttons. From the narrow waistband depend two wide streamers in the dress material, bordered with guipure. The coiffure consists of a cataqua of violet ribbon and black lace, ornamented with a bird of paradise.

The millinery subject represents a cap composed in one of the best Parisian styles. It is a graceful combination of lace, flowers, and ribbon, violet being the preponderating colour.

THE DUKE OF ATHOLE.

His Grace Sir George Augustus Frederick John Murray, K.T., sixth Duke of Athole, Marquis of Tullibardine and Atholo; Earl of Tullibardine, Athole, Strathtay, and Strathar; Viscount Balquhidder, Glenalmond, and Glenlyon; Baron Murray of Tullibardine, Gask, Charlton, Oak, in the Peerage of Scotland, Baron Strange of Knockyn, in the Peerage of England, Earl Strange and Baron Murray, in the Peerage of Great Britain, and Baron Murray, in the county of Perth, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, Baronet of Nova Scotia, Knight of the Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle, Lieutenant-General of the Royal Forces, Colonel of the Scots Fusilier Guards, Honorary Colonel of the Perthshire Rifle Corps, and Hereditary Sheriff of Perthshire, and Lord Lieutenant of Perthshire, and Major-General Lord Glenlyon, died on the 14th inst., at his residence, Dunkeld House, Perthshire, in the 74th year of his age.

His Grace was born on the 24th of April, 1787, the eldest son of Lady Emily Frances, second daughter of Hugh, second Duke of Northumberland, and George Augustus, fourth Duke of Athole. He was born Sept. 26, 1814, and was educated at Eton. He was, in his earlier years, in the Army, and obtained various commissions in the Guards; but he retired from military life altogether in 1839. He, on the death of his father, the first Lord Glenlyon, in October, 1837, inherited that title, and succeeded to the dukedom of Athole and the other family honours the 4th of September, 1846, on the death of his uncle, John, the fifth Duke of Athole, who died without issue. The Duke of Athole, while Lord Glenlyon, sat in the Parliament of Scotland, which post he held since the resignation of the late General Lord Frederick Fitzclarence, M.P. for Dundalk, the Royal representative of the Parliament took part with the brotherhood on several memorable occasions at Edinburgh, more especially on the laying of the foundation-stone of the Scotch National Gallery. In 1853 he was made a Knight of the Thistle. While Lord Glenlyon, the late Duke was a Lieutenant in the Royal Perthshire Militia, a calvalric pageant in August, 1839, known as the Eglinton Tournament, where he was Knight of Beauty. The tournament took place on the 28th of August, and one hundred armed Achilles men from his family home in Perthshire, a number of his friends and tenantry, were present at the festivities. The Duke's health was the seat of chivalry, and also the stalwart Marquis of Londonderry, Lord Anford, the Hon. Captain Gage, and other noble and spirited Knights, as well as the Duke of Athole, have passed away. The Duke of Athole among the few Knights now alive who participated in that romantic fete. The Right Honourable Ill. le also a cadet member of the Perthshire Militia. A natial tournament, having previously started on the Boulogne expedition. The Duke of Athole, while Lord Glenlyon, was Colonel of the militia of Tullibardine, his seventh Duke of Athole, who was born on the 6th of August, 1840, and succeeded his father in 1846, is the first representative of his house within the last few months returned home from service with his battalion in the Mediterranean. The Duke of Athole married, first, Lady Amelia Sophia, eldest daughter of Thomas Hay, eighth Marquis of Tweeddale, and by her Lady Louisa, eldest daughter of Thomas Robert, present Earl of Elmsley. The Duke of Athole married, secondly, Lady Jane Anne Agnes Graham, Flowergame Murray, Knight of the Medjidie, and Groom in Waiting to the Queen, is now heir-presumptive to the Dukedom of Athole. The late Duke of Athole was interred on the 21st inst. in a vault at the old Kirk of Blair, Athole, in the presence of a large number of the Duke's tenantry, yet the numbers who were present—the relatives and friends, the clergy of all the parishes in the district, the officers of the militia and artillery tenantry, the deputations from the Masonic lodges and from other public bodies—were not so numerous as they would have been had the funeral of the noble public personage taken place in the winter season. The procession, as started, its entombed the remains of a hero—Graham of Claverhouse, the Grahame Bayard. He was slain fighting for his country on the 27th of July, 1689, at the pass of Killiecrankie, where the Athole men, fighting in the front, bore commandment the standing of the Duke of Athole, and of the De Moravia, Moray, or Murray, Duke of Athole, is of ancient Flemish origin; and the Murrays have been distinguished in the annals of Scotland for centuries. It has held the sovereignty of the Isle of Man, and can show descent from the Royal Stuarts, and has been allied with the Royal House of Scotland, Stuart, and Bourbon, and with the very highest nobleme of England, Sir Isaac, and Sandys.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND.

His Grace Sir Henry Vane, K.G., second Duke and Marquis of Cleveland and Baron Raby, of Raby Castle, in the county of Durham, Hereditary Sheriff and Lord Lieutenant of the county of Durham, Viscount and Baron Barnard, of Barnard Castle, in the Peerage of England, and Baronet, son of William Henry, third Earl of Darlington and first Duke of Cleveland, by Lady Katherine Powlett, eldest daughter of Harry, sixth and last Duke of Bolton, died at Raby Castle, on the 16th inst., in the 79th year of his age.

The deceased nobleman was born on the 15th of March, 1788, and was educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford. He, while Lord Barnard, represented in Parliament the county of Durham from 1812 to 1813; Totnes, from 1826 to 1830; Saltash, also, in 1830; and South Salop from 1831 to 1841. He was sworn of the Privy Council in 1827, and was Master of the Buckhounds from 1827 to 1830. He was created Baron Raby, of Raby Castle, in the county of Durham, and strongly opposed the passing of the Reform Bill. He had been in that year, 1832, created Viscount Barnard, and he was also for many years Colonel of the Durham Militia. In 1842 he was made a Knight of the Garter. He married, first, on the 13th of May, 1813, Lady Grace John, fourth Earl Poulett, by whom (who died June 9, 1859) he had no issue. His Grace was, on the 15th inst., at his residence, Raby Castle, Darlington, in the county of Durham. He is succeeded by his next brother, Lord William Henry Vane, who is now Duke of Cleveland. SIR WILLIAM ATHERTON.

Sir William Atherton, Her Majesty's counsel and a Bencher of the Inner Temple, and recently Attorney-General to the late Prince Consort, died on the 15th inst., at his residence, in Eaton-place, with Margaret, daughter of Hollis Atherton, of Morpeth, and by her (who survives him) had issue. He was born in Glasgow, in 1806, and was educated in this country, and, adopting the law as his profession, was called to the bar in 1833. After keeping his terms, he practised successfully as a special pleader from 1832 to 1859, in the latter year he was appointed Attorney-General to the late Prince Consort Albert. He was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple, Nov. 22, 1839, and went the Northern circuit, where he soon obtained a considerable practice; and in 1852 he became a Queen's Counsel. He was the same year returned to Parliament in the Whig interest for Great Marlow, which he represented in the House of Commons, when, in December, 1859, he was appointed Solicitor-General to the late Prince Consort, and Attorney-General in July, 1861. He had before also refused the office of a judgeship. He, in the autumn of last year, relinquished the attorney-generalship in consequence of ill health, from which he never recovered. Sir William married, in 1840, Agnes Mary, second daughter of Thomas James Hall, Esq., Chief Magistrate of Bow-street, by whom he had issue. Sir William, to the regret of many friends, died suddenly. He was a man of a high and independent character, and of a most enlightened mind, and a most amiable disposition. He was universally esteemed in public and private, and his gentle nature had won him the affections of his professional brethren. Sir William, to the regret of many friends, and friends, died on the 22nd inst., at his town house, 19, Westbourne-terrace.

CHANGES IN PARLIAMENT.

In the period which has elapsed since the beginning of the Session to legal institutions in the personnel of Parliament have been above the average. In the Peerage death has been busy—five Dukes, three Marquises, four Earls, two Viscounts, and five Barons having gone the way of all flesh. The demise of the Duke of Athole, though expected for some time, has only recently occurred. His Grace was the son of a brother of the fifth Duke, who was created Lord Glenlyon, and he bore that title for some time before his accession to the dukedom on the death of his uncle. The only special political act which one remembers the late Duke of Athole to have performed was in 1846, when he moved the address to Lords in the House of Lords during the ministry of Sir Robert Peel, when the Duke of Wellington had retired. The demise of the Duke of Cleveland, which took place a short time ago, was somewhat sudden. His Grace was the second Duke in the direct line of gunity to his father dating only from 1833. In early life the Duke was known as Lord Barnard, and was appointed to an Earl of Darlington as a Peer he was a regular attendant on the sittings of the House of Lords, though he took no active part in the debates; and he was observable for his stalwart form, in which was set off his fashionable green coat with brass buttons and a peculiarly-shaped hat were conspicuous. The death of the Duke of Hamilton was premature, having been caused by an accident. Holding the rank of premier Duke of Scotland, he was also Duke of Brandon in the Peerage of England, by which title he sat in the House of Lords. His connection by marriage with the Bonaparte family of the French empire, he was a member of the innermost circle in the Imperial family. The Duke of Grafton has also died at an advanced age.

The Marquises who have passed away in the last year comprise the names of Sir Robert Shafto Adair, Marquis of Lansdowne; the late Marquis of Normanby, who, beginning political life as a Whig Radical, died a Conservative and something more; and Marquis Townshend, who, a remarkable principle by his sympathy with the Poles. All these peers have left successors to their titles.

The necrology of Earls includes the names of the late Lord Earl of Elgin, the Earl of Clare, Earl Charlemont, and Earl Beauchamp.

The two Viscounts are Lord Hardinge and Goldstone and Lord Massereene and Ferrard—the latter an Irish Viscount, but sitting in the House of Lords by courtesy.

The five Barons whose deaths have to be recorded are Lord Seaton, one of the last of the Peninsular and Waterloo Lieutenants, the late Duke once said that he was the only General who could get the command men out of a difficulty in military principles; Lord Ashburton, created by reason of Lord Lyndhurst and of Colin Campbell, Lord Clyde, as amongst those who have distinguished us the world, and to add to the number of Lord Hatherton, well known as Mr. Littleton in the days of old Whig ascendancy; and of Lord Chesham, a member of the Buckinghamshire family and a recruit to complete the mortuary role of the House of Peers.

The earliest change in the House of Commons last year was caused by the retirement of Sir M. Seymour from Devonport. He has been succeeded by Mr. Morrison, the Conservative Lieutenant-Colonel and Adjutant of the Inverness Militia. Mr. Francis Powell has succeeded Sir A. Stuart as member for Portarlington; Mr. W. H. Gregory has replaced Mr. Moody as member for West Somerset; and Cambridge-shire has lost Mr. Eliot Yorke, who has been succeeded by Conservative Dissenter, on whose retirement Lord George Manners was elected. The death of Captain Gladstone, brother of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has left a vacancy in the representation of Devizes, which has been filled by Mr. W. Addington. Mr. Bernal Osborne succeeded the late Colonel Perceval for Rye. Mr. Bandon; Mr. Berner has taken Mr. Richarton's place at Lisburn; Mr. Freeland succeeded Mr. Hutchinson for Dover; and Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. John Abel Smith, back to the house; the succession of Lord Palmerston to the dukedom of Athole has given Lord Chelsea a seat for Thetford; and the accession of General Upton to the Irish peerage has left a vacancy for Carlow, which Mr. Bruen has filled up the place of the late lamented Sir George Lewis as Radnor has been filled by Mr. Walter, who previously has exchanged with Mr. C. H. Hamilton for Mr. J. T. Hamilton, father and son; and Mr. Daniel O'Connell, brother of the late Daniel O'Connell, succeeded Mr. Bright's brough of Truro available for the Attorney-General for Ireland, Mr. O'Hagan.

The city of London, on the death of Mr. Western Wood, chose Mr. E. I. Gordon as its member. At Kinsale, Sir G. Colthurst has succeeded Sir J. Arnott. Lord Clifford succeeded Lord Arundel as Lord Clifford, and Mr. Cotterell succeeded Mr. Cotterell. Mr. Potts, member for Barnstaple, having died, has been succeeded by Mr. Lloyd; while Mr. Hutchinson, son of Mr. Serjeant Hutchinson, has been succeeded by Mr. Leicester, a nephew of the late Speaker of the House, a seat for Reading. Mr. Cubitt, the late Speaker of Lord Lonsdale, and Mr. Cubitt, the late member for Bridport, and Mr. Hanbury, London, have caused vacancies for Windsor, Oxford, and Andover, which have been supplied by Colonel Grey, Mr. Neate, and Colonel Humphery. The Hon. W. Cavendish having become Lord Chesham, has left in the room of his father, which has been filled by the Liberals, has been lost by that party by the election of a Conservative, Mr. Harvey.

With the mention that a vacancy has occurred for the city of Durham by the death of Mr. Hutt, the late Liberal member (and that Mr. Conglan, one of the members for Brighton; and Sir James Emerson Tennent, for Belfast, are also dead), we finish this somewhat lengthy record of the changes in Parliament during the last twelve months.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.

THE following circular has been issued by the Premier to the supporters of the Government for the meeting of Parliament:—"Downing-street, Jan. 23, 1861. Government is desirous that Parliament having been further prorogued to Thursday, the 31st inst., for the despatch of business, the public business of importance to Parliament should be brought forward as early as may be after that day. I am charged with your convenience to attend at the House of Commons at the usual hour. Your obedient servant, PALMERSTON." To Sir, your obedient and faithful servant, PALMERSTON."

The following circular has been addressed by Mr. Disraeli to the members who usually act with him in the House of Commons:—"Grosvenor-gate, Jan. 23. Parliament having been further prorogued to Thursday, the 31st of February, and I would express my hope that your attendance may be early on the first day of meeting. Your obedient servant, B. DISRAELI. Hughenden Manor, Jan. 24."

The Working Men's Club and Institute Union, of which Lord Brougham is president, has received support on provisions of a considerable enforcement. The system of instituting clubs for working men has been found to be of great benefit to its extension, by the aid of a central establishment, is obviously desirable. Since this union has been in existence—that is to say, within the space of little more than a year—upwards of forty clubs have been formed under its auspices. Lord Lyttelton, one of the vice-presidents, in pointing out the several claims of the society, took occasion to show that the small existing prejudice against any such body is founded in a misapprehension of its objects, and that it is not a political movement. He recommended coalescence for the promotion of objects which most of the members proposed have been familiar to the mind of this country. We need not dwell upon the value of mechanics' institutes, but the establishment of agricultural and manufacturing improvement; of the amelioration of the dwellings of the poor, and the promotion of sanitary reform, are matters which come under the same conditions, and there are obvious special grounds on which its utility may be asserted.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

A very old bookseller, we believe the oldest in the metropolis, has just passed away. We read in the Times obituary of last week:—

On the 18th inst., at Charterhouse, in his ninety-first year, Mr. Rowland Hunter, formerly of St. Paul's-churchyard, with his uncle, Mr. J. Johnson, the well-known bookseller, whom he succeeded.

Uncle and nephew kept shop on the north side of St. Paul's-churchyard: it was not, like Lackington's, a "Temple of the Muses," but plain and unadorned, befitting the quarters of the bookselling of Protestant Dissent. Johnson's family were Baptists. After he was burnt out from the premises—in, I think, 1810—Rowland Hunter took him up in St. Paul's-churchyard; there he published for William Cowper, John Home Tooke, Dr. Priestley, Dr. Geddes, Dr. Disney, Dr. Enfield, Mr. Fuseli, Mr. Bonnycastle, Mrs. Barbauld, Mary Wollstonecraft, and Miss Edgeworth. In 1788, Johnson began here The Analytical Review.

But his greatest hit was the publication of "Cowper's Poems," of which we have heard on the authority of a contemporary of Johnson's that the MS. poems was offered to him by publication by a relative of Cowper's, who had received them from the poet's own hand, and whose object therefore was to have Cowper come to his friend. Johnson declined the publication of them, and published them; but the reviewers condemned them to the trunkmakers, and Johnson's publishing offices in the churchyard and Fleet-street's shop smaldered for a long time. At length, Cowper's relations called again upon Johnson and requested him to print off a few copies of the poems, and accepted upon the same terms as before; they contained "The Task," and were no sooner published than the reviewers hailed Cowper as the first poet of the age, and this success set the first published poems in motion. Johnson reaped the harvest of his misjudgment, and, in 1811, "Cowper's Poems, only two years' copyright, produced the sum of £6700.

Johnson had a large country-residence at Walton, to which fine business succeeded his nephew, Rowland Hunter, as bustling and obliging a bookseller as client or bookworm could desire to meet with. His worldly success does not, however, appear to have kept pace with his years.

Curious things turn up occasionally. Why should anybody go find an old joke in monastic manuscripts? in one of which, relating to Meaux Abbey, we read:—"A certain lay brother, a shoemaker, had a cesspool on his Sabbath day, and would not allow himself to be taken out from beneath the hole, that he might not violate sanctum. But Clare, Earl of Gloucester, would not permit him to be dragged forth on the following day, being Sunday, out of reverence to his Sabbath, and to the law that there." A similar story is told of Saint Stephen, who died four years after the foundation of the abbey, "a certain soldier from Conway, Gwynedd, who was a worshipper of St. Patrick's purgatory, and, upon his return, he gave an account of the keys and pass which he had received there." The Abbey of Meaux, Kent, six days before Easter Sunday, there occurred an earthquake throughout the whole of England, so great that the monks of Meaux, while at vespers, on arriving at the verse 'He hath put down the mighty,' in the Litany hymn, they saw many monasteries thrown down so violently from their stalls that they all lay prostrate on the ground." These amusing things are printed for the new Number of the Journal of the British Archæological Association.

Although the Decoration Gate of the Quadrangle of St. Giles-in-the-Fields has not yet been removed, in the general as well as the artistic sense, our contemporaries are busy with the history of the curious work of art which is now doomed to the hammer. Nothing, be as well to make our contribution, without waiting for the Churchwardens' assistance of the gate. In most modern inscription was "The Day of Judgment," in alto-relief, which filled the lunette over the Long-acre, and eastern-gate, originally over the west gate of the old church in 1687. Mr. George Scharf, jun., in his artistic paper read to the Society of Archæologists, 1850, upon "Representations of the Last Judgment," has well described this example :—

The figures in this work are very well proportioned to the semicircular lunette they occupy. The tiers of the Blessed, surrounded by rays, holding the banner of redemption, and with a joyful hand pointing upwards. Angels playing musical instruments, and tumultuously expressing the joys of heaven, conspicuously among them, is Orpheus the Thracian, who is known to be seen in order. The penitential attitudes of the rising dead, and of the condemned, being marshalled by infernal fiends, and driven to the left hand directly and ignominiously cupid from his sublime conception. This side-relievo is executed in a bolder style than the other, and the whole composition is carefully drawn and polished. The date over all of the words, "Remember all the soul passes after death. These are few or no perfect copies of a papyrus. That at present in the Soane Museum is a very fine one, and when published will, it is expected, be very complete.

Photography has been of unbounded service to the instant illustration of archæology. The photographs exhibited by Mr. Lawrence of the Roman remains discovered on his estates at Wycombe, in Gloucestershire, and partly engraved in the Archæological Journal, evidence. Still more important are the large photographs of the Roman remains found at Chester, and exhibited by Mr. Wright at the last meeting-room of the Society of Antiquaries. The minuteness of the Corinthian capitals is very extraordinary, and the restorations complete the illustrations of these very interesting remains, now swept away. It is to be remembered that they were discovered in this class that Daguerre pointed upon his discovery in 1838.

At this festive season surprises are in order. Pretty bottles have long been famous items of domestic archæology. Mr. Charles Reed, F.S.A., lately exhibited four samples to the Society of Antiquaries, one of these bottles being of very large size, in fine condition, and capable of holding three quarts of liquor. Respecting leather bottles Mr. Reed has lately found no reference in Shakespeare, whereas King Henry, on the field, says of the shepherd—

His words sleep under the fresh tree's shade,
And all his woolly sheep graze on the mountain, and some incidental allusions by early writers to "leathern bottles" along on the highway. Could we obtain a more satisfactory account as to their make and use than was to be found in an old song of the year 1600 in refrain of certain lines being—

So I with him joy where'er he dwell
That first found out the leathern bottel.

Eulogising the "bottel," because the "cans of wood" broke when they fell! because there was plenty of room for the pleasant "pipe and tabor fine" and "black pots," which man and wife might "pull asunder" in domestic strife, while the liquor was the song concludes—

And when the bottel at last grows old,
And with cold liquor no longer bold,
Out of the side you may cut a clout
And mend your mate when he's worn out;
Or take and hang it upon a pin
Until you've got liquor in and things in.

Two of the specimens exhibited had large holes cut open for the sake of a label, and were undoubtedly of the description of the ecptacle for odds and ends. The ballad which Mr. Reed has quoted was originally printed in D'Urfey's "Pills to purge Melancholy," and was communicated by Mr. Albert Smith to the Mirror, vol. xxxvii., 1841, with a woodcut of a leather bottle, which Albert met with among the treasures left by an elderly cousin. "The Golden Bottle" was the sign of James Hoe, in Cheapside, in 1657; and of Mr. Richard Hoare, goldsmith, in Fleet-street, in 1693; and when the banking-house was rebuilt the old sign, a gilt leather bottle, was replaced over the entrance, where it may now be seen. Hone, in connection with the Great Fire of London, in 1666, a tradition explaining the choice of this sign by the bankers. We remember to have seen a sign of a public-house sign of the Leather Bottle, at Leversdock-green, Herts.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DR. F.—Your letter gives his opponent the odds of the Queen is not debarred from the privilege of and using a Queen for every Pawn which he advances to its 8th square.

L. L.—We do not see all the newspapers published in America which give a chess column; but we have seen the New York Tribune, and believe its literary and sterling, as the best conducted paper in the United States.

J. B., Birmingham.—One of the positions to which you refer has been in type, we find, for some time, and will appear in a few days. The other is under consideration.

J. H. Lowe.—Your old friend, the problem, is not without influence of interest.

T. SMITH.—As we have before had occasion to remark, the Chess Column of a paper could not be considered a great deal of needless trouble on your part to submit every one of your problems to the scrutiny of the accomplished young one mentioned before sending it to us.

W. H. K.—Your letter is received. We are glad to hear of the progress of the club of which you are the secretary. In reply to your question, we are of the most judicious compositions in the world" when assistance; must be endowed with any qualification, at least, of mediocrity, to be considered worthy of publication. We think that the solution in question is not perfect, but we will look at it carefully before we decide.

CORRECTED.—We have not seen the new chess work by Messrs. Anderssen and Dufresne, and therefore cannot say whether the following variation of the Evans Gambit, which a number of especially associated games, is doubtful, by Mr. Anderssen, on several of the occasions when he has played it in his recent match with Mr. Dufresne, is to be found in the following collection of many fine positions could not be suggested to Mr. Staunton's mind.

Should it be still defective, we fear, dear White, at his second move, may spoil it, and, as he is a "Knight of the Rueful Countenance," be defeated.

TURLETTON.—There is a Chess Club at Reigate, as they play; but we are not acquainted with the names of members.

A. K. Edmonton.—What is the object of sending the problem? Do you require the solution?

MATCH BY CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE EDINBURGH AND DUNDEE CLUBS.

The contest between the above-mentioned Chess Clubs has just terminated in favour of the Dundee, the numbers being, Dundee, 2; Edinburgh, 1.

The deciding game, which we append, was not begun before October 1st last, and, as will be seen, the moves, from the time it occupied in playing and in the number of its moves, of any game of chess ever played through the post-office.

THE FARM.

The conviction in the Leigh harmaking case has been unanimously quashed by the Court of Queen's Bench, who decided that a small farmer who works on his farm is not "a labourer," and, in fact, does not come within the provisions of the statute, (the 20th of Charles II.) for the effective observance of the Sabbath. The question as to whether the saving of the hay we or was not a work of necessity could not be argued, as that was a matter of fact for the decision of the magistrates. One of the Judges seemed rather to incline to the view which he put to Mr. Mellish, that if a farmer apprehends wet and the destruction of his hay, he might not be held to be in the position of his "ordinary calling" if he seemed in saving it. However, that question is not before us. We have only to deal with the circumstances which might have been introduced in arguing it, the difference between men borrowing, exchanging, and a house on fire overflowing the hay meadows. The barristers "boarded as the pard" received an additional fee, and the public were left to form their opinion as to an incidental remark by Mr. Justice Crompton, on the construction of the statute, that a man who worked hard if a man was found to a barber on a Sunday should escape scot free, while the barber was punished. The Judge remarked that "judging from what we latterly see around us, shaving is not a matter of necessity."

The Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester, Retford Bird-book," has just published the able and exhaustive lecture on Hereford cattle which we read last month before the members of the Royal Agricultural College. He combats therein the general notion that Hereford cows have no great aptitude for milk, and quotes as one of his authorities in their favour Mr. Stewart, of Tillichewan, who says, "I have had one of his cows, Patience, has given as much as 14 lb. of butter per week last spring without any extra food. In twenty-two months she made, at 2½ lb. of butter, per day. Mr. Duckham maintains that "the quality of the Herefords is not inferior to that of other breeds," and we find that the great London butchers and salesmen indorse this opinion. The Hereford cow of Mr. Thomas John Powell was the first sold at Brampton Madley on the 2nd proximo. The whole of the herd are described from the pen of Mr. Coleman, by Leicester, as the winner of the first prize in his class at the first meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society, held at Oxford. The produce has been crossed principally with Mr. Hewer's bulls.

Mr. Mark Stewart has recently sold his Framed fed by Second Cherry Duke of Northumberland, for 1000 guineas. The former cross has lost his Venus de Medicis, which was originally purchased at a long price by the late Duke of Northumberland. The cow was a very perfect animal, standing on perhaps the most beautiful leg we ever remember to have seen in any of the Shorthorn stall. Mr. Mark Stewart Pirnie is now at Southwicke, where the Cherry tribe is still carried on by Cherry Duke, Cherry Duchess, Cherry Countess, Cherry Lord Duke, and Cherry Flower by Red Rates.

The Shorthorn Bull Association admitted at the recent half-yearly general meeting of the Highland and Agricultural Society was 110, which is considered a large number of a Shorthorn Association. The Royal Highness Prince Alfred was present, and the Prince of Wales was unanimously elected a member, on the motion of the Duke of Buccleuch, seconded by the Marquis of Huntingdon. Among the new members is the Rev. John Constable, Principal of the Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester, and Mr. Malcolm, of Poltalloch, Perthshire. Premiums were awarded to reports on Phosphatic and Ammoniacal Manures, on Sales of Stock, Steaming Food, and on Guano. Antonia Maxuring. Foot Rot in Sheep, Mixed Plantations and the Breeding of Roadsters and Hackneys. A resolution of sympathy with the part of the meeting was conveyed to the Dowager Duchess of Athole, expressing the regret felt at the loss which she had sustained by the death of his Grace, who was buried in the old churchyard of Blair Athole on Friday.

The forthcoming exhibition of paintings at Edinburgh will be enriched by contributions from Her Majesty, Scotland Society's winners, from Hamilton Palace, one of them Sir Colin Campbell, the first prize Ayrshire bull, and the other Sir Walter Scott, the first prize Clydesdale stallion, and many others. They will also include the head of Mr. Gourlay Steele, of Edinburgh, who at present engaged on the "Return from Waterloo," a picture of which is likely to be the old Castle of Dunbrean, in Argyleshire, and represents Mr. Maxwell, of Poltalloch, Mr. Campbell, Kilmichael, and Mr. Hammond both, and Steele is about to commence his figure picture of the meeting of the Highland Society in Edinburgh, which will include not far short of 150 portraits of distinguished Scottish and English agriculturists, and will occupy the whole space of all the walls in the arrangement of the society's prize list.

A cold day has been fixed £7 and costs for bringing to Worcester market two cows suffering from foot and mouth disease. It was proved that the symptoms were so slight as to have been by any possibility overlooked by him, although the cows were among a lot of from twenty to thirty. The invalids were ordered to be detained for the adversary's cattle, and not to be given to the owner till the costs of their care and maintenance have been paid by the defendant.

The Duke of Leeds, Mr. Pusey, Mr. Du Cane, &c., have secured Christmas addit, might be framed and glazed with advantage in every landlord's house throughout the land. The Duke remarked that he was glad to find that the permission he gave some years since to his tenantry to kill the rabbits on their respective farms had answered very well in every respect. He regretted, however, to find that the arrangements made in a spirit of kindness and generosity to his tenants had not succeeded so well as he had wished, and he now proposed to them a plan of destroying rabbits which was in such a manner could enable every tenant to enjoy three days coursing, placing each district under the control of two of the principal tenants residing in it. In allusion also to the recent destruction of game by the frosty fog he damage done by game, he remarked that it had never been his wish, as they all knew, that any tenant should be a loser by game on his occupation. Those tenants who had been so damaged had for several years received compensation, and he thought they would admit that he had always endeavoured to meet them fairly in the matter. It was not easy always to estimate the amount of damage done by game, but he would be believed the amount of compensate he had paid was assessed by gentlemen who were perfectly disinterested as regarded game, and he trusted they were satisfied, and he hoped by the coursing arrangements proposed to afford sport to many of the tenants themselves and their friends, but by reducing the number of hares reduce at the same time the complaints of damage."

On the 1st of February, and thenceforward, money orders can be issued at the Post-office in the United Kingdom on the island of Trinidad at the same rates of charge and under the same regulations as those already in force for the issue of money orders for other colonies business is transacted.

HORSE-RACING IN EGYPT.—The Cairo races, established by the present Viceroy (says the Alexandrian correspondent of the Times) were run for the first time on the 1st inst., and attracted a great deal of interest about three miles from the city. The course was an oval of two miles in length by half a mile in breadth. The ground was laid out neatly with pebbles, and was broken by transverse ruts formed by the rain—on the whole, tolerable ground, and not too deep in sand. The course, for lack of sufficient weight, was five miles, for £300 and £100 to the second. Four English horses ran, the property of Egyptian grandees, by the permission of the Oheyun bread, who, however, lost the race by his rider dismounting at the third mile, and then remounted and came in third. The winner was the property of Osman recovering the money from the English horse, which was the property of Mr. Cooper, who, it is said, has hitherto won all his races, did not run, as he was considered certain to win without our precedence. The race was run in fifteen minutes. Altogether it was a great success. Besides the Viceroy's stables, there were fifteen other entrances; the arrangements excellent. A book was erected for the Viceroy, and a grand stand for the ladies of the harem, who were provided with carriages, each of six covers, besides the private table for his Highness and his guests, all at the Viceroy's expense. At the conclusion of the day's sport, the Viceroy ran for by the Bashi Bazouk cavalry, who darted off in a body at full speed, and were followed by a number of Arabs on foot. The Viceroy's guests were Count Sponeck, Austrian Minister at War; Sir Charles Macarthy, Governor of Ceylon; Count Sartiranski, Count Nobili, and several of the Consuls-General. It is to be hoped that the English will endeavour to retrieve their name at the next meeting, to be held in May, at Alexandria, for it cannot be denied that a good English horse will have no difficulty in beating Arabs at any distance. The horses which ran on the 5th were Blackaway, Young Spatax, Xalexter, and Engineer's Horse, the latter of which was the winner. It was observed at the same time unexpected by the Viceroy himself, to see the interest displayed in the race by the ladies of the harem. It was thought that the Arab horses, and more of the high officers, no one but the Europeans would have cared for them.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1244.—VOL. XLIV. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1864. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE SESSION.

ALTHOUGH shorn of the Regal pomp and circumstance which accompany the opening of our great legislative council, the present Session commences with a moral solemnity and a suggestiveness of important coming events such as have not characterised the inauguration of Parliament for several years. We have been accustomed of late to look forward to the Speech from the Throne as a document which has puzzled its concoctors, inasmuch as it has been their task to endeavour to say something when, in fact, they had nothing to say. If Ministers were able to announce formally the advent of a single measure, the paragraph which contained that statement has assumed an aspect almost ludicrous, and political critics have sneered at the hand-to-mouth policy of a Government which appeared to trust to the chapter of accidents, and to wait for something to turn up to enable them decently to occupy the time of the Legislature from February to the end of July. In the present instance, it has needed no specific mention in the Queen's Speech to indicate what must be the chief care and the principal matter for discussion in the coming Session. Unless a diplomatic miracle occur, our Parliament this year will have to consider the question of war in all its melancholy bearings, and with all its anxious and distressing consequences, as the first and main object connected with the national weal. It is true that a subject so important, and on the face of it so engrossing, will probably not entirely interfere with the conduct of domestic legislation; but in such a case it is inevitable that, even if the Government had projected measures involving changes of moment and principles of weight, they must sink and disappear before the absorbing interest and necessity of a war policy. Earl Russell cannot have forgotten the painful and lamentable collapse of his efforts to pass a Reform Bill even of the mildest kind, nor can Mr. Gladstone fail to remember how he was baffled in his gallant attempts at introducing a peace Budget and to bring the expenditure on abnormal fleets and armies within the ordinary revenue of the year, while the war in the Crimea was raging. If we are involved in hostilities with the German Powers on the Schleswig-Holstein question, all Parliamentary doings this year which do not relate to that matter will be reduced to comparative peddling.

In dwelling on the prospects of the Session of 1864, therefore, we are naturally compelled to accept the war question as the first consideration. Indeed, the commencement of hostilities between the Austrian and Prussian and the Danish troops has brought matters to such a crisis that the part to be taken by England must already be decided. There is something in the feverish haste with which the two leading German Powers have precipitated events for which it is difficult to account. No doubt it may be assumed that the federal action against Denmark is the result of a concession to popular feeling in Germany. But, whatever may have been the liberalising tendencies of the Government of Austria of late, it can hardly be supposed that it has become so far unmindful with unconscious Constitutionalism as to go to war merely for the sake of complying with an expressed sentiment of the Austrian people; while, as far as Prussia is concerned, the relations between the King and the people have not been such as to bring about so suddenly a sympathy between them, founded, on the part of the Monarch, on pure personal disinterestedness. If, as may be assumed, the action of Austria and Prussia is severally dictated by a secret ambition to obtain the lead and to be acknowledged as the head of Germany, the race between them is a close one; but at least this idea gives a clue to the rash policy by which they are dragging all Europe into war.

If, as seems inevitable, England is drawn into this war, there would seem on the face of it some justification for the theories of a certain class of politicians, who would be content, the action this country should be one of isolation from that of Continental Europe. Much may be, and probably will be, said of the complications caused by our Royal intermarriages with members of Europe's chief reigning families, and of the extent to which matrimonial alliance with the King of Denmark will be cited as the motive cause for our espousing his quarrel against the German Powers. In the present instance, however, it happens that our Royal intermarriages have been of a kind which may be called personal relations to some of the most important parties engaged in this Schleswig-Holstein difficulty. With the Royal family of Prussia our own Monarch has nearly if not quite as direct relations as with that of Denmark; for, besides the fact that the Princess Royal of England is the wife of the Crown Prince of Prussia (who, by-the-by, is in person taking the command of a corps which is pressing on to Schleswig), the mother of Prince Frederick of Prussia, who is a Princess of Prussia; and his brother is an officer in the Prussian army. More curious still is the circumstance that the claimant of the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, Prince Frederick of Augustenburg, is connected, and closely, too, with the Queen of England; for he is married to the Princess Adelaide Victoria of Hohenlohe, daughter of the Princess Anne Feodorowna of Leiningen, sister of the late Duchess of Kent, by her first husband, Prince Charles of Leiningen. This Princess, therefore, is half sister to her Majesty, and, by consequence, the Prince of Augustenburg is nephew, by marriage, to the Queen of England. If, then, it should be the policy of this country to interfere actively on behalf of Denmark, it will be a fair answer to say taunt that our policy is influenced by motives arising out of near family alliance, to point to the blood relationships which exist more remotely on the part of both sides; and to affirm that, in the midst of the complications which arose out of these circumstances, England took the part of those to whom, on a careful weighing of its merits, the justice and the right of the case belonged.

While, then, in the ensuing Session, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is mourning over his vanished surplus with the agonised groans which may be expected on the occasion of his reimposing the full duties on tea and sugar, and adding penny after penny in the pound to the income tax; while the Secretary for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty are presenting their estimates for augmented Army and Navy; while the militia is being called out, and the patriotism of the volunteers put to the crucial test of active service as a force for home defence, it may be possible, and probably will be, for the Queen's Government to occupy the spare time of Parliament by amending the law of bankruptcy; to reorganise the London fire brigade; to interpose in the proposed siege of this great city by metropolitan railway companies a counter-, but not to settle, the question of convict punishment; and to deal with any of those minor measures which, in every Session, spring up with the rapidity and the fecundity of mushrooms, and which hide the scarce a flower in the orders of the day and to prolong the sittings of the House of Commons to one and two o'clock in the morning. It is quite within the province of expectation that the Conservatives will hold high political festivals at the Wednesday morning sittings, and that they will exhibit their strength by defeating any bill which may be introduced for the abolition of rotten boroughs, or any other or other ways vindicate their opinions against what they call dissenting encroachment. No doubt the question of the ballot will occupy an hour and a half one day before dinner; the subject of the Maynooth Grant to Monday evening, for the sake of laughter, jest, and impatience; and, in short, all the hobbies of individual members will be ridden through their course, as usual. But it is much to be doubted whether the hit-by-hit Parliamentary reformers will find the time this year more encouraging for bringing forward their measures. Again, this year, if all that portends come to pass, Mr. Locke King will have to be silent about a £10 franchise in counties; and Mr. Baines will not be heard to advocate a £5 qualification in boroughs. It is not very likely, either, that in the face of a European war party warfare will be roused. The Conservative body may and do boast that they hold the fate of her Majesty's Ministers in their hands; but it may fairly be questioned whether even the chivalrous courage of Lord Derby, or the self-confidence of Mr. Disraeli, will induce them to endeavour to wrest power from Lord Palmerston at a time when power means responsibility of the gravest kind and implies the skilful conduct of vast European complications. Whatever may betide, whatever of the fortunes of England may be impending, it is, we think, certain, that the helm of the State must continue to be guided by the experienced and still able hand of Lord Palmerston. It is possible that there may be changes in the Ministry and modifications of the existing Cabinet; but if we are to come within the influence of a political storm, be it slight or mighty in its extent and pressure, it is to that statesman that we shall have to look, as the pilot who is to enable us to weather it.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The debate on the address in the Corps Législatif, in reply to the Speech from the Throne, closed yesterday week, after a discussion which occupied the Chamber three weeks. The entire draught of the address was adopted by 241 to 32.

On Monday the Emperor received, in the Throne-room of the Tuileries, the deputation of the Legislative Body chosen to present the address. The President and the members of the bureau of the Legislative Body headed the deputation. His Majesty was surrounded by the great officers of the Crown and by several distinguished military officers and officials. On his Majesty's right hand stood Prince Napoleon, and on his left Prince Lucien Murat. In reply, his Majesty remarked on the prolonged debates on the address, and declared that he was glad that the time had been taken to reduce to nothing the accusations which had been skilfully spread. His Majesty remarked that he was not the chief Minister, but only the government, pointed out the ill effects of restlessness and constant change in the system of administration, remarked that he was awaiting, from agreement and from time, such ameliorations as are possible, and warned them against compromising the present good by the desire to have the impossible.

At Tuesday's sitting of the Legislative Body an Imperial decree was read proroguing the Session until the 25th inst.

The Emperor has conferred upon the Comte de Flahault, lately Ambassador at Vienna, the dignity of Grand Cross of the Légion d'honneur, of the Légion of Honour.

The Bill which has been posted in Paris announcing the sale of the palace of the "permanent" exhibition at Auteuil. The upset price is fixed at 2,250,000f. The sale will probably be found to be wound up.

One of the most useful works in progress of extinction in Paris is the railway which is to connect the various stations of the great lines with each other. The bridge over the Seine at the Point du Jour is 480 yards long, and is to be constructed of iron, and borne by 4 viaduct 2140 yards long. Three more viaducts are to be constructed between the Seine and the Marne. The first viaduct, 1,000 metres on the left bank of the Seine, 1530 yards long; another crossing the valley of Bercy, 1,000 metres, or 1,530 yards; and 1,127 yards long, from the high road to the Grand Junction. The line between Auteuil and Bercy is 4,000 metres, or 6,120 yards in length, one of which is to be on the right bank of the Seine. The first station will be that of Point du Jour, 1,000 yards from the Champ de Mars. The station of Vaugirard, which comes next, is 2000 yards from the first, and 1220 yards from the fortifications. The station of Mont-rouge, on the road of Montrouge, which is 1660 yards from the preceding. The station is situated between the Orleans railway and the road to Choisy le Roi. The Orleans station, which comes last, will serve as a transit for the goods coming from the line of Sceaux.

From Mexico we hear that the troops under Juarez had been routed at San Luis Potosi, and that the Generals Doblado, Parrier Marquez and Mejia. Juarez is said to have narrowly escaped capture.

BELGIUM.

The Ministerial crisis is at an end. The King applied to the heads of the various parties to undertake the task of constructing an Administration, but failed. The Cabinet, with the exception of M. Van Hoorebeke, remains in office.

PORTUGAL.

The project of law abolishing the tobacco contract has been presented in the Cortes. The duty proposed to be levied is 1200 reis per kilogramme on manufactured tobacco and 2000 reis on cigars.

The stormy debates respecting the late loan continue. The Opposition is severe in its censure on the conduct of the Minister of Finance with respect to the loan. The Minister made a long and able defence, but the bad impression has not been removed.

Yesterday the Duke Bandiera and Senhor Anselmo Braancamp have left the Ministry in consequence of the bad reception by the Cortes of the proposed reforms in the loan.

ITALY.

The Senate has been discussing the bill for the suppression of brigandage in the Neapolitan provinces. The Minister of the Interior reported favourably regarding the decrease of the brigand bands, and the improved state of public order and condition of the Southern provinces. The Minister for War stated that in case of any emergency he could, without difficulty, concentrate 20,000 men in the entire safety, withdraw a portion of the troops at present stationed in the south, and, if necessary, recall them.

Garibaldi has been proposed by the Neapolitans as their Parliamentary candidate. Signor Colonna withdraws from the candidature in respect for that great name. The Neapolitans, it is said, are most enthusiastic in favour of Garibaldi.

The result of the elections is favourable to the moderate party.

AUSTRIA.

The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath, in full sittings last week, discussed the report of their "Committee of Ways and Means" upon the request of the Government for a loan of 10,000,000 florins. The motion of the sum by one half recommended by the Committee was adopted; but the Government declared that it would not assume the responsibility of the Government with regard to Denmark was rejected by 165 to 66 votes.

Advices from Vienna report that the Emperor gave on Saturday last his full consent to the acceptance by the Archduke Maximilian of the Imperial Crown of Mexico. The Archduke has but consented on no way engages the Austrian Empire.

The Fleet under Admiral Tegethoff is gathering large armaments on the Mincio, as if in expectation of some sudden movement from the Italian side.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

War has begun in Schleswig-Holstein. On receiving the German Commander-in-Chief summoned the Danish General to evacuate Schleswig, giving him till five o'clock in the evening to reply. The Danish General replied that "he had orders to defend Schleswig." At midnight the general alarm was beaten at the head-quarters of the Prussians, then at Kiel, and the army marched northwards, crossing the frontier between Holstein and Schleswig, and proceeding to Gottorf. Thence they pushed on rapidly to Eckernförde, off which place were lying two Danish men-of-war. A few cannon shots were exchanged, and then the ships of war steamed away, and Prussians took possession of the town. The Danish troops who were in the place retired.

Meanwhile the Austrians, forming the left of the invading army, crossed during the night at Rendsburg, and fortified town on the Eider which has been so frequently mentioned of late. A handful of Danes fired a few shots from the Kronewerk, or principal redoubt, and then retreated, with the rest of their troops, over the River Sorg, and on Sorge, three miles north of Rendsburg, destroying the bridge or bridges as they retired. A slight skirmish occurred between the outposts, in which the first blood was shed, the Danes losing one non-commissioned officer killed, and two privates wounded. The Austrians were taken prisoners.

A sharp engagement at Missunde, on the Schlei, has taught Marshal Wrangel by experience that he will encounter a stubborn resistance on the line of the Danewerk. The Prussian, under Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, advanced from Eckernförde on Tuesday and on the Danish outposts at the bridge and the works which form the tête-de-pont of Missunde, on the southern shore of the Schlei. They then opened a heavy fire over of the fire of twenty-four field-guns, to storm some of the Danish works, but were repulsed after a considerable loss of killed and wounded. The Danish outposts were again thrown out. In this action the Prussian loss was considerable. Fifty men were among the wounded, and one company had 130 men killed or wounded. No estimate of the Danish loss has been made, but it is said that no account was made in order, if possible, to flank the Danewerk, and thus to catch the Danes in a sort of trap. The Prussians appear determined to continue their advance towards Schleswig. A point of great importance, as it is at the very narrowest part of the Schlei. On Wednesday they were bringing their artillery up to the front and making other preparations for a renewed attempt.

While the Prussians were maintaining this repulse, there was likewise an unimportant skirmish at Brecknndorf between the head of the advancing Austrian columns and the Danish outposts.

A despatch from Schleswig, on Wednesday evening, gives the following account of an attack on that day by the Austrians:—"From half-past three this afternoon the Austrians attacked the position of the Danewerk at Schaferhaus. Artillery and columns of infantry marched against Hadebly. Towards dark the enemy withdrew, leaving a few prisoners in our hands. Later in the evening firing recommenced, but ceased for a time. At 10 o'clock one of the Ministers, Bang and the President of the Council, inspected the works at Missunde in the forenoon. They then went to Eckernförde, had the firing at Missunde, and witnessed the retreat of the enemy from the extreme point of the Busterf works." A telegram from Munich, on Thursday, gives the advantage to the Austrians. It states:—"In the attack upon the Danewerk yesterday the Austrians stormed the redoubts of Busterf and Wedelgrang, but have still one work before them. Cannonading continues to-day."

The position of the opposing armies in this campaign is soon described. The Danes occupy a line south of the Schlei, from Eckernförde on the Baltic to Missunde, and its strongholds, while extending from the bay of Eckernförde nearly to the Schlei. Their main force appears to be at Schleswig, where they hold the bridge on the Danewerk—their whole force, of which very different estimates are given, being probably about the large line of 40,000 men.

King Christian left his capital on Sunday night, amid the acclamations of the people, to join the army. He was accompanied by the Crown Prince and the Premier, Bishop Monrad, reached Fredericia at noon on Monday, and immediately went to inspect the fortifications of the Danewerk.

A provincial law has been issued at Copenhagen for enabling an accelerated election of the Landsthing.

General Wrangel has issued a proclamation to the Schleswigers explaining the future arrangements of the civil commissioners of Austria and Prussia will be confined to Schleswig.

In the case of the Duchies of Holstein, if not in their presence, at Gottorf and Eckernförde, Duke Frederick of Augustenburg has been proclaimed sovereign of Holstein.

"The strength of the hostile armies is estimated as follows by the Hamburg correspondent of the Times, in a letter dated the 31st ult.:—"According to information on which I have reason to rely, the combined Austrian and Prussian forces, including the corps of Hanoverians and Saxons and Hanoverians; but it is, of course, a question how far their co-operation is to be relied upon. The Austrian army alone is superabundantly strong in cavalry, which may be said to diminish their apparent strength, since in an attack on the Danewerk it will be of little service. The Austrians have 72 guns being for infantry and artillery. As regards the strength of the Danish army in Southern Schleswig, it may be stated at about 40,000 to 45,000 men outside. The whole Danish army is not more than 60,000, and we must allow for troops in garrison at Rendsburg, Schleswig and the remainder of Holsteiners and Schleswigers, which have been weakened by desertions or which it is not considered safe to trust in the field. Some Schleswigers are quartered in the island of Alsen—not alone, but mingled with troops on whom greater reliance can be placed. In the town of Schleswig, according to very recent intelligence, there were 1600 men. The great bulk of the Schleswig-Holstein army will be also scattered with it, renders a large force necessary for its defence."

It is stated that Russia has protested at Vienna and Berlin against the decision of the two great German Powers to occupy Schleswig.

The Bavarian Government is taking steps to call together a conference of the German States favourable to its own views, in order to come to some decision as to the course which they should follow in the Schleswig-Holstein movement.

AMERICA.

There is not any intelligence of military interest from America. The main bodies of the opposing armies were motionless, and the only activity displayed was by the raids of light cavalry. The weather was severe, and the movement movement was likely for the present, but both sides were making the most extensive preparations for the spring campaign. It is stated that the Federals intend to make a double movement on Richmond. The Federals bombarded Charleston from the land side on the 16th inst. On the 18th a sortie was going on when the last reports left. Much mischief to property and casualties, both in men and life, has fallen on the people preparing to meet the anticipated attack by the Confederate ironclads. On the other hand, Charleston is the key to the defence of the advantage of the Confederates, who are believed to be well fortified and in strong force there. The Federals are reported to have landed a force at Morehead City, North Carolina. The journals of that State continue to urge peace with the North, and there is, beyond doubt, a strong Union feeling existing there.

A volume of diplomatic correspondence has been laid before Congress, containing a list of communications between the British and the Federal Governments. In one letter Secretary Seward declared that the Federal Government persist in maintaining that England is responsible for the losses sustained by American citizens from the depredations committed by the Alabama, and demands claims for compensation. In complaining of the outfit of iron-clad rams in English harbours, he declared that the same must be done by the usual some of the great American ports, and that the Navy Department had not a moment to lose in making preparations to protect them. In the event of such an attack, a retaliatory war would be inevitable. Earl Russell replied that such a threat was not looked upon, but he After Earl Russell's despatch Secretary Seward directed Mr. Adams to inform the English Cabinet that the United Government would be compelled to withdraw its own minister from London. In order to endeavour to conduct its intercourse with England on the most friendly terms, when compelled to resort to neither side any permanent cause for discontent.

The correspondence between the British and the American Governments, the main subject of which is the Alexandra and her sister ships, has been published. Mr. Seward complains of Chief Baron Pollock's decision in the Alexandra case, and intimates that, if that be English Law, not only does it require amendment, but America will have to take unusual steps to protect herself against it. The American Secretary continues, that America is sufficiently chastened by the civil war to make any concession compatible with the interests of the national life and honour, but she cannot stand the fitting-out of Alabamas and Alexandras, and the responsibility for the consequences will not be with the United States. Lord Lyons, in reply, points out the unlimited loan in this country, Mr. Seward says, prompted the Government to abandon its neutrality. Lord Lyons puts an end to all concessions for mitigating the rigour of the blockade in regard to the shipment of tobacco and cotton. To a complaint of the enlistment of British subjects in the Federal service, Mr. Bennett responds that it should not be repeated unless all British subjects are discharged from the Federal service, and ordered given out to enlist any more. In respect to compensation for the depredations of the Alabama, the noble Earl says they cannot be recognised by the British Government, as they are not founded on grounds of law and justice.

With regard to France, M. Drouyn de Lhuys had urged the recognition of Mexico as a monarchy by the Washington Government. Mr. Seward had flatly declined; and, while avowing that the United States would adhere to a policy of non-intervention, he expressed a belief that the establishment of a monarchical government in Mexico found neither desirable nor easy.

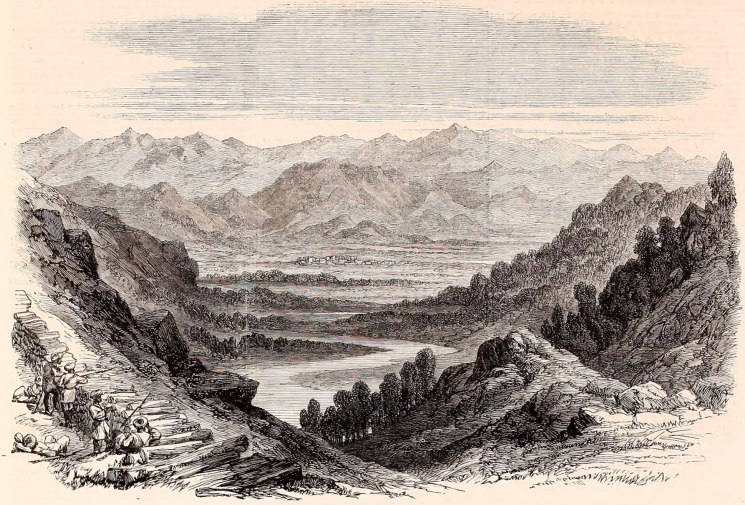
The House of Representatives has passed a bill imposing a duty of two cents on tobacco, and an additional duty of 40 cents per gallon on imported spirits.

General Banks has been appointed to command the district of Missouri.

General Dix has issued a proclamation declaring that more than one tenth of the population of Louisiana desired to return to the Union, whereupon the State laws consistent with the action of such a convention shall revive the State Constitution, and that members of Congress shall be elected.

Thomas Francis Meagher has delivered a panegyric on General Corcoran's services to the Irish soldiers in the American army in New York. His numerous references to the Fenian Brotherhood were loudly cheered.

The Confederate Congress have received their persons who formerly had been allowed to exempt from military duty, and have passed substitutes will not be exempted by a perpetual resistance.



A resolution pledging the Confederate States to defend Mount Vernon. It was asserted that some Confederates had made preparations to go to Canada, for the purpose of rescuing the Confederate prisoners confined on Johnson's Island, in Lake Erie, and that a detachment of British troops had been sent to watch their movements.

OPENING OF THE SWEET-WATER CANAL AT SUEZ.

ILLUSTRATIONS FROM EGYPT.

WE have received from Mr. Frederick George, of Cairo, a sketch representing the Opening of the Sweet-Water Canal at Suez, of which an Engraving appears above; and two Illustrations of the races recently held at Cairo, given below and at page 124.

OPENING THE SWEET-WATER CANAL AT SUEZ.

In Mr. George's report of his visit to the works of the Suez Canal, which we published at the beginning of last year, he mentioned that the company were then devoting their energies to the formation of this supplementary canal, without which the construction of the Grand Maritime Canal would be next to impossible; and in a recent Number we announced its completion. Fresh water from the Nile is now carried through canals to Suez, viâ Zagazig and Lake Timsah, a distance of about 130 miles, of which eighty miles has either been made or restored by the company. The advantages of an abundant supply of sweet water to the rapidly-increasing town of Suez and its shipping are inestimable, independent of the great facilities it will afford for the transport of the company's material and stores and the maintenance of the people at work on the maritime canal.

The inauguration of this important work took place on the 29th of December last, a small portion near Suez having been left free of water for the purpose. The ceremony of cutting the dam was performed, in the presence of a large number of people, European and native, by Mr. Ruyssenaers, who, in the absence of M. de Lesseps, represents the company in Egypt. The French military and naval officers and men, from the transports lying in the roads, mustered in force; their fine appearance and bearing giving a certain brilliancy to the scene, and contrasting singularly with the dusky groups of Arabs who lined the canal banks, watching the proceedings with rather more interest than an Arab generally is capable of. Sweet water in Suez has hitherto been a precious commodity, and available only to the rich. The assembly afterwards adjourned to a large shed, tastefully decorated with emblematical devices. Refreshments had been hospitably provided by the administration, and Mr. Ruyssenaers took occasion to address the visitors in a few pointed sentences, in which he sketched the progress of the works from its commencement, and congratulated the world upon the general success that had been the result of their labours. He prefaced his remarks by a graceful allusion to the distinguished public services of the late Lieutenant Waghorn, who originated and established the "overland route" to India. A dinner and ball at Schembri's Suez Hotel concluded the festivities.

Unfortunately, the dyke at the Suez end of the canal has since given way, and a considerable quantity of water has been lost; but measures have been taken to avoid further accident of the kind by the substitution of substantial masonry.

HORSE-RACING IN EGYPT.

The Cairo races established by the present Viceroy were run for the first time on the 5th ult., on the desert near Abbaieh, distant about three miles from the city. The course was an oval of two miles in length by half a mile in width; the ground was hard and mixed with pebbles, and was broken by transverse ruts formed by the rain — on the whole, a somewhat good practice course. The first race was for Arab horses, three miles, for £500, and £100 to the second; it was won by Hamdallah, the property of Ali Effendi, the close contest with Dubby, owned by Halim Pacha. The second race, for horses of all nations, catch weights, four miles for £300, and £100 to the second. Four English horses ran, but were beaten without a struggle by an Arab horse of the Omrah breed, who, however, lost the race by his rider dismounting at the last mile, which permitted a chestnut mare of Ali Pacha's to come in first, the Omrah recovering the second place. The third race was for Arab horses, and was gained by Ali Pacha after a close race with a grey mare belonging to M. Guichard, but not with Hafiz. Altogether it was a great success. A kiosk was erected for the Viceroy, and a grand stand for the Europeans. A buffet was provided of twenty-five tables, each of six covers, besides the private table for his Highness and his guests, all at the Viceroy's expense. The course was properly staked and corded, and kept by cavalry pickets and mounted police, and the whole passed off without a single quarrel or accident of any kind. Two fine regimental bands performed in the intervals between the courses. The first race was run in about seven minutes, the second in fifteen, and the third in six. At the conclusion of the day a purse of £100 was run for by the Bedouin Sheikhs, which ended in a close and dense clump, forming a very pretty and animating spectacle. Among the Viceroy's guests were Count Delaporta, Austrian Consul-General; Sir Charles Macauley, Governor of Cyprus; Count Barcaisnan, Count Nobili, and several of the Consular corps. The whole entertainment was intrusted by the Viceroy with all the arrangements; and it is to his exertions added to the Viceroy's liberality that the great success attending this attempt to introduce racing into Egypt must be attributed.

The General Legislative Assembly of Brazil was opened on the 1st of January.

The Gazette de France says —"A letter from Clermont-Ferrand (Puy-de-Dôme) states that the author of 'Madame Bovary' is very ancient and highly reversed in the country, and never takes out of the chapel except on the great calendar festivals. His wife is rich, and wills in the diamonds and precious stones ornamenting it, estimated at 50,000f.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

PALMYRA as it is to recur to the terrible story which arrived by the last South American mail, the story which has caused a shudder throughout Europe, is too great and strange to be left unnoticed, and there are also some considerations which make it a practical duty to make a few remarks upon the frightful facts.

We will not dwell upon the afflicting details. All who are likely to read these lines are aware that on the 8th of December last a festival, or celebration, in honour of the promulgation of certain decrees of the Pope, was being held in the town of Arica, in a large church at Santiago, in Chili. The edifice was crowded with the female population of the place, high and low, and all were dressed in their lightest and gayest attire in honour of the occasion. The service was proceeding with much fervour with every conceivable device which clerical ingenuity could devise, and thousands of oil lamps were lighted in order to close the festival with becoming splendour. In the course of the proceedings, the pasteboard contrivances caught fire; and everything, including the roof of the building, being highly inflammable, the church was almost instantly in a blaze. The fire dropped upon the high dresses of the assembly women, and such a scene ensued as has never been paralleled. There was no escape from the place; the narrow entrances were soon choked up with the fallen; and ere long the whole congregation of women—numbering, it is said, two thousand—had perished by fire, by suffocation, or by being trampled to death.

Such, very briefly told, is the awful history of the 8th of December. When we were rejoicing in our household at Christmas, the unhappy inhabitants of Santiago were wailing for their dead. Perhaps the most merciful doom was theirs whose entire families were gone, and the heads of the house who died in the midst of it recovered. But those whose home lived to mourn those who had been killed what must that Christmas have been! Let us be thankful that no such carnage was wrought among us; let us think with deep commiseration of the sufferers, and let us, while believing that they had been obeying the voice of religion, And, let it be our case to speak of that which few who have read the details will ever forget.

But let us turn to a practical consideration. It is certain that no such crowd as that which died at Santiago will be collected by such means in England. But it is becoming more and more the custom to draw together enormous crowds by attractions of a religious character. Now, we do not make little or no provision for the escape of an assemblage in the event of a sudden alarm. Anyone who has once in his life seen a crowd, no matter whether composed of high or low, in the agitation of a terror, knows how entirely beyond the control of reason it becomes. There is but one thought, one cry—to get out; and none will wait; all will crush, and the scene is one which makes us all ashamed of our nature. There are many buildings in London and around it—music-halls, theatres, chapels—which are slightly filled by a waster crowd than that in the church of Santiago, and from which, thanks to the construction of the places, escape would be as simple as possible. The subject is one of papers as this impression of our Journal will contain the Royal Speech. But such there are; and every London architect who reads these words will tell such places of upon his fingers, and will require little or no reminder. What proves it to be better than cure is an English saying; but it is, strangely enough, an English saying only, which seldom or never becomes a doing. We do not like preventive measures. We are ignorant, and reckless, and very impatient of "fuss," especially if it entail expense. Men will sometimes take precautions; but they find little favour in the eyes of women, who are very brave, and sometimes very unwise. Let the Fire Brigade tell how fire-escapes are neglected, and chimneys left uncared for, and the Coroners tell how policies are allowed to lapse. A girl was burned the other night at a theatre, and is dead. Were there any precautions taken to prevent the recurrence of a scene that has happened so often? Firegurds stand by the very side of fireplaces in rooms where girls fly about in crinoline, but the safety-wires are not put on. We could go through a long list of instances in which the most ordinary care would preserve life and limb, but the most ordinary care is not taken. But may we not depart from our national character in presence of such an awful event as that in Chili, and take some care for the thousands who will take home for themselves? Parliament will not have much to do at present; might not the Home Secretary be incited to require a report from the police as to the means of exit from the various buildings in London in which great crowds constantly gather. That is a practical suggestion, and not altogether unworthy to have been suggested by the awful tragedy presented in Chili.

THE COURT.

The Queen, with the members of the Royal family, returned to Windsor Castle from Osborne yesterday (Friday). Her Majesty, it will be gratifying to learn, has expressed her gracious thanks for holding all levées and Drawing-rooms herself during the ensuing season. It is also authentically stated that the Court will reside at Windsor Castle, the Queen coming to London when necessary for State occasions.

On Thursday se'nnight her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Leopold and Countess Blücher, and attended by the Marchioness of Ely, the Hon. Mrs. Grey, Colonel the Hon. Sir C. B. Phipps, Colonel H. Ponsonby, Colonel Sir T. M. Biddulph, and Mr. Duff, embarked at Gosport in the Royal yacht Fairy and visited Royal Victoria Hospital at Netley. The Queen landed at Netley at a quarter before eleven, and was received by Colonel Whitmore, C.B., Commandant, and the officers of the establishment, who conducted her Majesty to the Royal Chapel. The Queen went to the various parts of the building, and inspected the arrangements, visited the kitchen, and, attended by Dr. Robertson, Inspector-General, with the Medical staff of the hospital, entered the wards where the sick are treated and made inquiries of several of the patients as to their condition. Her Majesty re-embarked at one o'clock, and returned to Osborne. The Earl and Countess of Derby arrived at Osborne on a visit to the Queen.

Yesterday se'nnight her Majesty walked and drove out.

On Saturday the Queen was attended by the Marchioness of Ely, walked and drove. The Earl and Countess of Derby left Osborne for London.

On Sunday the Queen, Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, Prince Leopold, and the Duchess of Roxburghe attended Divine Service at Whippingham Church. The Rev. G. Prothero officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, walked and drove out.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by Prince Leopold, walked and drove. Sir Charles Wood arrived at Osborne on a visit to the Queen, for dining with her Majesty.

On Wednesday her Majesty held a Council, which was attended by Earl Granville, the Right Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, Bart., the Right Hon. Charles Villiers, M.P., the Clerk of the Council, attended. At the Council the Sheriffs for 1864 were appointed. Sir Robert Malcolm attended from the Queen. Payments amounting to £600 having been made on account of life-boats building, the proceedings terminated.

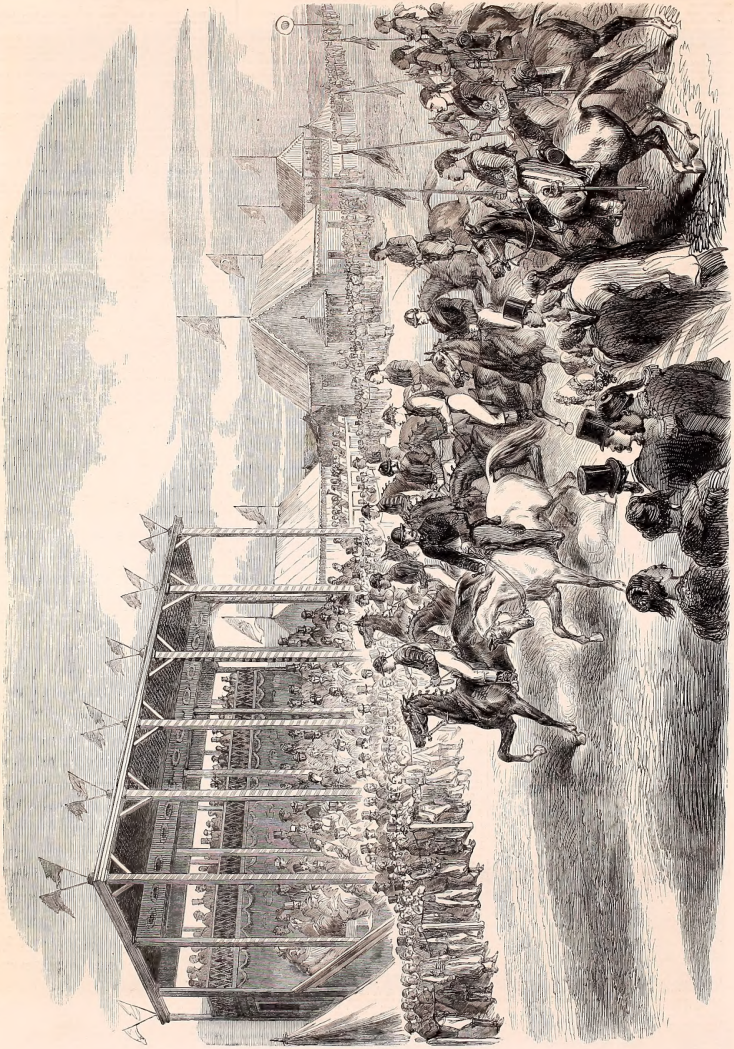
LAW AND POLICE.—The Alexanders case is set down for argument in the Court of Queen's Bench this day. A rule was granted of four Judges from the Court of Queen's Bench and four from the Court of Common Pleas.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have appointed Monday next, at eleven o'clock, to deliver judgment in the long-pending cases of Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson, and Messrs. Parker and Mr. Goodwin.

Mr. Kennedy, who was the sub of Mrs. Swinfen in the famous Swinfen case, has been appointed by the Lord Chancellor Chancery Counsel, a coveted dress drawn by himself, giving to him, as a reward for his services, the Swinfen estates after the death of Mrs. Swinfen, who is now very ill, and likely to repudiate the deed. The Master of the Rolls held that the deed was invalid as having originated in undue influence exercised by Mr. Kennedy. The deed delivered judgment yesterday week, confirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls and dismissing the appeal with costs.



William Henry Barnes, a man of respectable appearance, was charged at the Mansion-house, on Monday, on a charge of having embezzled nearly £2000 of the money of Messrs. Mitchell and Co. He was found guilty, and sentenced to four years' penal servitude.

Mr. Tyrwhitt, the police magistrate at Marlborough-street Police Court, gave an important judgment in respect of the Merchandise Marks Act on Tuesday. An old case had been brought before him in which he was required to exercise sentences to state how they became possessed of plumbeous metal, and, finally, Mr. Tyrwhitt. The cases underwrote gave the required information.

Tyrwhitt ordered the defendants to give the required information.

The Lambeth police-court was presided by Mr. Lambert, pour-law inspector, at Belmont-green, on Tuesday. It related to the charges which had been preferred by the guardians against Dr. Moore. These charges were of various kinds—fostering neglect of duty, making claims for cases which he never attended, and other matters. The inquiry was adjourned.

Dr. Lankester held an inquest on Tuesday at Greenwich-hill, St. John's-wood, on the body of Mrs. Stoke, wife of Mr. F. Stoke, of Greenwich-terrace, who was burnt to death on Sunday. The deceased was formerly celebrated as an actress, under the name of Miss Cleveland. In fifteen years 40,000 persons under twenty years of age have died from burns, being at the rate of eight a day.

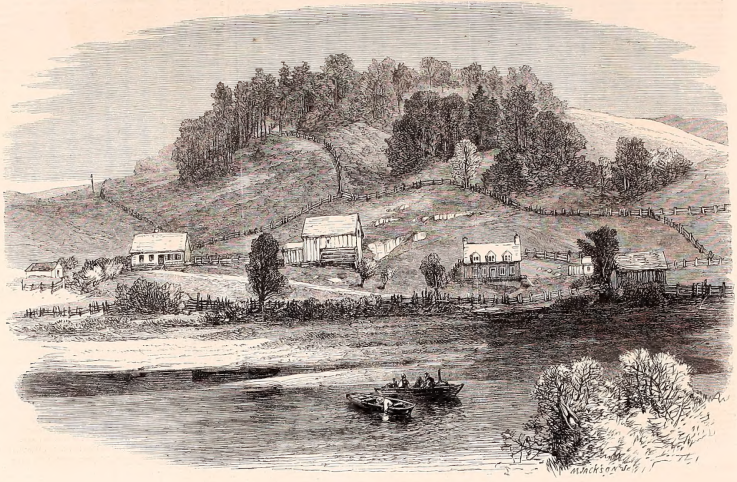
OPENING OF THE IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The fifth Session of the sixth Parliament of Queen Victoria was opened this day by Royal Commission, the Commissioners being—the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Argyll, the Earl of St. Germans, Viscount Sydney, and Lord Stanley of Alderley.

At two o'clock the Royal Commissioners, in their official robes, took their seats on the Woolsack, when the Lord Chancellor directed Sir Augustus Clifford, Usher of the Black Rod, to command the attendance of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, to command the attendance of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, to command the attendance of the Gentleman



FEB. 6, 1864

The fact was, that the Government wished the House to get it out of its collective and take the responsibility of the initiative. If the House, he protested against a Government without a policy. It was for the Government to take the lead, and the House would follow. It was of course which it might take the lead, and the House would follow. It was of course which it might believe was for the honour and interests of the country; but after the events of the session, he could hardly trust it. They had shown that within six months the Government had lost the confidence of Russia and the cordiality of France. Even after these exploits, was within an ace of a war with Denmark? The King of Denmark stood alone, and England had no allies. If the Government would frankly appeal to the House of Commons it would support it. England had trusted it as one of ability and experience; it had expected to be told what the Government thought should be done; but, if they had no policy, they had not fulfilled their duty to the House and the country.

After some delay,

Lord LYVEDEN said that he had hoped other members would have addressed the House. His noble friend opposite (Lord Wodehouse) had not addressed the House. His noble friend opposite (Lord Wodehouse) had not addressed the House. He ought to have said, he could easily satisfy them. The Government did not think that they could lay before the House a policy which was at once satisfactory to all parties. They had laid before the House a statement of their views, and they had no more apologies to have repeated it. Our relations with Russia were unsatisfactory, and the negotiations which had been carried on made public. With respect to the treatment of the Emperor of the French, he hardly complained of it by the right hon. gentleman. He thought the country were more calm and simple than those of the Continental, and they often misinterpreted the language of the press. He would briefly reply to declining the congress there was anything unfriendly to France in declining the congress there was anything unfriendly to France in the right hon. gentleman. Emperor of the French, which had been called by the Emperor of Russia, would have accepted the proposal, which had been made by the Emperor of the French, and he was glad to believe it to be one. They believed the Government did not consider it to be their duty to be dragged into a war that it would lead to a general war, and if that was not to be the case then it would lead to the greatest calamities. He would, however, affirm that the conduct of the two Governments were as cordial as ever, and that, although differences of opinion might, and often would, arise between Governments, they were not to be feared. He denied that the Government was taking the House for a policy. The Government had not done so. He was certainly not taking the House of Germany and he stated in his speech, was to reconcile Austria, Prussia, and Denmark. If the right hon. gentleman had a policy to propose to the Government ought not to have been hesitating into war. That was not the view of the Government. They had not hesitated to enter into war in the view of the Government. They had not hesitated to enter into war in 1852, and within the last few hours they had Treaties of 1852, which the Germans were satisfied. Our engagements declared that, when the Treaties and the integrity of Denmark in accordance with that treaty, they were bound to support it. There was no evidence that Denmark had been guilty of wanton aggression, and WEDDING GIFT FROM THE LADIES OF VICTORIA TO THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

A COMMITTEE was formed some months ago, under the auspices of Lady Barkly, to collect subscriptions for a bridal gift to the Princess of Wales from the ladies of Victoria, Australia. It was determined that this gift should be of colonial material and workmanship; and, after much deliberation, a graceful design, by Mr. Chevalier, for a flower-stand, 22 in. in height, was approved, the construction being intrusted to Messrs. Kilpatrick and Co., of Collins-street, Melbourne. Gold is the metal principally employed, but Victoria silver from the St. Armand district has been introduced into the base. The latter is triangular, each face presenting an enamelled shield with the arms of the Prince of Wales, of Denmark, and of Victoria respectively. At the angles are represented a bale of wool, a bunch of grapes, and a nugget, as typical of colonial industry; whilst higher up, as representing the fauna of the country, an emu, a kangaroo, and a lyre bird are grouped round the foot of "a tree fern." The stem of this fern is encircled by a cincture, and the expanding fronds which rise from it serve as a support for the flower-vases. These consist of five emu eggs arranged in the form of a star, each bordered by a wreath of leaves from the native flora, wrought in gold filigree. This wedding present was brought to England by the last Australian mail.

NEW DRINKING-FOUNTAIN AND PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS, CHATHAM.

MANY towns of any size and importance have at least one public drinking-fountain. Chatham has two of these blessings to the thirsty wayfarer. The smaller of the Chatham fountains is due to the liberality of Mr. R. Winch, in the front wall of whose brewery it is placed. The larger, represented in our Engraving, is a more imposing structure, and was designed to serve as a memorial to the late lamented Prince Consort as well as to answer an end of great public utility. It stands at the top of the Military-road, on a piece of ground granted by the Board of Ordnance for the purpose, just where the road leading to Brompton divides into two branches, which unite again near the old parish church of St. Mary, the one leading across the upper, and the other the lower, drawbridge. Close by we have the Gun-wharf, Dockyard, Marine and Line Barracks, Melville Hospital, the Soldiers' Institute, and other Government buildings and establishments which make Chatham so important and busy a place. The lofty grounds at the back of our Engraving are the celebrated Chatham Lines, where the troops drill and exercise, delightful alike for the extensive view and the fresh air which can be obtained there. Close above the fountain, and a little to the left, are Fort Amherst and the Sabrina Battery.

It is more than three years since the erection of a drinking-fountain for Chatham was mooted by some of the leading inhabitants of the place; and it was felt that there could be no more suitable spot for it than that on which it now stands, as most of the men employed in the Government establishments pass by it on their way to and from work. The project was not very warmly taken up until the death of the Prince Consort, when the question of paying some special mark of respect to his memory in a town which had been so long and so intimately connected with the Sovereign and the Government of the country became one of great public interest, and the fountain project received a stimulus from becoming associated with it. A subscription-list was opened, and a committee formed, of which the Rev. S. Arnott, Vicar of St. Mary's, consented to act as secretary. Architects were invited to furnish designs, and one by Mr. G. E. Street was accepted. After a while the erection was commenced, the Admiralty having contributed a considerable sum towards the expenses. The committee worked to some extent by faith, not having in hand nearly the amount required; and so it came to pass that before the fountain was completed the work had to be stopped and boarded up to wait for more prosperous times. Thus it remained for several months, an eyesore and a reproach to the inhabitants. At length James Budden, Esq., Captain of the Chatham Rifle Corps, a very liberal and public-spirited man, presented £100, and engaged to become answerable for any further sum which might be required. Then the fountain was quickly completed, and on Wednesday, the 26th of October, it was opened with great eclat by General Sir F. Smith, the member for Chatham.

We have dwelt thus long upon the fountain because it is the most recent, although by no means the most important, feature in our Engraving. In point of size as well as of public utility, the parochial schools claim a far greater share of attention, more, indeed, than we have now space to give them. These schools, intended for the population attached to the mother church of Chatham (in which parish and precinct there are now three churches besides the old parish church of St. Mary), were erected in the year 1860, after designs by Mr. G. E. Street, of Russell-square. The buildings, which embrace three schoolrooms, a classroom, and house of residence adjoining for the teachers, and afford accommodation for about 900 children, cost about £2400—this sum including the fencing of the ground and all incidental expenses. The contractor was Mr. Wilkins, of Chatham. The site was granted by Government on a lease of 999 years. The Admiralty, the War Department, and the India Board made contributions in aid of the buildings, which were erected by voluntary donations, assisted by a grant from the Committee of Council on Education. The Chapter of Rochester, who are patrons of the living of Chatham, were also liberal donors. The schools were opened in the year 1861, and are now maintained at a cost of about £170 per annum, under the direction of a body of managers.

LECTERN IN NEW COLLEGE CHAPEL, OXFORD.

An Eagle Lectern, of which we give an Engraving, has recently been presented to New College by the Senior Fellow, the Rev. W. Bigg Wither. It is the work of an amateur, the Rev. R. Baker, of Hargrave, Northamptonshire, Curate of Shelton, Bedfordshire, who exercises his art for the benefit of the restoration-fund of Hargrave Church. The bird is studied from the living eagle, and is almost a reproduction of the one exhibited in the International Exhibition of 1862. The lectern was designed by Mr. E. F. Law, of Northampton, and was highly appreciated by the committee of the Northamptonshire Architectural Society. It consists of a centre octagonal pedestal, upon the cap of which the eagle stands with expanded wings. This pedestal is supported on four sides by flying buttresses, formed of tracery of transitional character. The buttresses are finished with square pinnacles, set diagonally, each of which is surmounted by the figure of an angel, representing, on the north, Mercy; on the south, Praise; on the east, Prayer; and on the west, Justice. The lectern is of large size, standing eight feet high, and is well proportioned to the noble chapel, where it was inaugurated at the "gaudy," or Founders' Commemoration, on the 12th of November last.

THE PEKIN, ONE OF THE EUROPEAN-CHINESE SQUADRON, LEAVING CHEFOO, SHANTUNG.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE TERRIBLE CALAMITY IN SANTIAGO, CHILI: RUINS OF LA COMPANIA CHURCH.—SEE PAGE 135.

THE PEKIN, ONE OF THE ANGLO-CHINESE SQUADRON, LEAVING CHEFOO, SHANTUNG.

We have already announced the breaking up of the European Chinese naval force, under the command of Commodore Sherard Osborn, Captain R.N., and stated the reasons which led to the squadron's ending; and we now give, on the preceding page, an Engraving showing the departure of the Pekin from Chefoo, Shantung. The squadron rendezvoused at Chefoo early in October 1900, and consisted of the "Keangsoo," despatch paddle-steamer, 300-horse power; the "Algerine," Captain Bate, R.N.; the Pekin, screw, 200-horse power, 8 guns, Captain H. T. Burgoyne, R.N., second in command; the "Lapwing," gunboat, 200-horse power, Commander Arthur Salwey, R.N.; Kwangtung, paddle, 4 guns, 150-horse power; Commander Cecil Bingham, R.N.; Tien-Tsin, screw, 2 guns, Commander Cowan; Woodcock, Third, screw, gunboat, 80-horse power, 4 guns, Commander Cruickshank. The store-ship Edward Lucas, 4 guns, Commander Cumberbatch, and the steamer Bullarat was left at Shanghai with the naval attaché, Captain Bayly, R.N. The squadron remained at Chefoo waiting the arrival of the Commodore from Pekin, to which place he went from Chefoo shortly after his agreement with China, to arrange Peace Terms relative to the future movements of the squadron. On the 13th of November the Commodore returned from Pekin, and issued his final orders for the force to be broken up and certain ships to return to England, the remainder to proceed to Bombay to pay off, and those crews to return home. On leaving shows the Pekin leaving the island of Kung-Kung-Tao (Chefoo), on the 21st of November, with the flag of China and the Incident (her Britannic Majesty's gun-boat) stationed at that island manning their respective rigging.

Nothing could surpass the kindness of the Tsotai of Chefoo, and, in fact, of all the Chinese, during the two years the ships were at Chefoo. The hearty good feeling existed between Lieutenant Nicolas, R.N., and his crew in her Majesty's gun-boat Incident and both the officers and men of the European Naval Force. Lieutenant Nicolas is in command of a small naval depôt on the island of Kung-Kung-Tao, and afforded every help to the crews to spend their stay.

The Commodore, with the rest of the squadron, left for Shanghai on the 18th of November last. The other ships proceeded at once to England, calling only at the Cape of Good Hope.

THE COMMENCEMENT OF WORKS FOR THE THAMES BARRIER.

The preliminary operations for carrying out this enormous scheme have at length begun; and we are enabled to give, in the present issue, a general view of the initiatory works, which are being proceeded with as rapidly as the difficult and complicated nature of the several arrangements will permit. The Engraving shows the progress already made at a point near where the embankment will commence—namely, close to Woolwich Ferry. Here we find piles being driven in, and scaffolding of an extensive character being erected to support the steam pile-driving machinery and its attaching cranes. This part of the work is preparatory to forming a coffer-dam, and thereafter proceeding with the excavation of the foundations, which must necessarily be laid very deep to be sufficiently permanent. The caissons are twelve feet by seven, and the piles are driven in to a depth of thirty-five feet; but this, we may remark, is not of timber, as is usually the case, but of iron, which, it is thought, will afford great advantages over the old-fashioned material. The Engraving shows that the works since these labours began, and already the public may trace by means of piles which mark their course, the future course of the river, the form of the proposed structure; but the chief attention of the contractors is at present confined to the neighbourhood of Westminster Bridge, to its so-called "special" works for a handsome stone-built bridge, and to a part of the Victoria Embankment. Here, as Mr. Francis, who is just completing the northern outfall works for the main drainage, between Barking and Crossness, is also engaged on the contract with the Metropolitan Board of Works for the portion of the Thames Embankment between Westminster and Blackfriars Bridges for the east of the year 1905. The work will be inside the open roadway and the approaches to the river, two distinct subterranean chambers—a subway and a manhood's way for the gas and water pipes and telegraph wires will be laid, so as to avoid the necessity of disturbing the road surface when these pipes are needed; and beneath the subway a great sewer, forming part of the system of low-level drainage laid previously, will intercept the enormous works will be laid about 14 ft. beneath low-water mark, in the low tenacious clay and a bed of gravel, which is found at 25 ft. in thickness, whose substratum is solid London clay. The length of the embankment from Westminster Bridge to Blackfriars Bridge will be about 1700 ft., and its width will vary, to suit the design, from 130 ft. to 450 ft. It will commence at the north or northern abutment of Westminster Bridge, and will be continued in a line with the embankment fronting the Houses of Parliament on the western side of the bridge by a curve of the northern bridge pier of Hungerford Railway Bridge, and thence to Waterloo Bridge, as we have already stated. Beyond that bridge the width of the embankment is to be carried as far as Blackfriars, no immediate action upon the part of the authorities seems probable, but a wide and handsome sloping carriage-way will be created by the demands of the Benchers of the Temple, the increasing traffic requiring to be taken over Blackfriars Bridge, and other improvements in connection with the Temple Gardens. According to statements heretofore published, the whole of the embankment will be open to the metropolitan railway projectors into schemes for utilising it after their own fashion) will be varied to an extent which it is not necessary to describe in the following brief description, and in front of the Duke of Buccleuch's house and grounds (at one time so much talked of in connection with the embankment by the Parliamentary Committee to this enterprise) the embankment will be 200 ft. wide, as at Hungerford Bridge. The roadway, which is a bed in the stream, and the embankment will be wide in proportion—namely, 100 ft.; and at Waterloo Bridge, where the roadway will become still greater—namely, 450 ft.; but from that part it diminishes until at Salisbury-street and the end of the Adelphi and its Waterloo Bridge to even about half the last-named width. The level of the embankment will be about 5 ft. above Trinity high-water mark, so that there will be a slight ascent from the Hungerford Bridge from the road to the embankment level of 1 in 80 ft. The great sewer beneath will commence at Westminster Bridge, and will be on a level of low water, and will be continued, with a fall of about 2 ft. per mile, past Blackfriars, along the line of Tower-hill, and onwards in the direction of Stratford, where it is intended to be grouped with the other low-level sewers. It is not our intention at present to enter fully into a description of the whole of the proposed works, partly as the details will very probably undergo a change, progress, so as to suit the necessities and difficulties which will arise in course of their being made. We shall watch the progress of the main interior works, and provide our readers from time to time with accounts and sketches of the more interesting features of this gigantic labour.

AN INCIDENT IN THE WAR WITH THE HILL TRIBES ON THE PUNJAUB FRONTIER.

A CORRESPONDENT contained the gratifying announcement that the expedition against the hill tribes on the Punjaub frontier had been brought to a successful close. After two serious actions and the destruction of the villages of the offending tribesmen, the force surrounded to our forces and sued for peace, which was granted, hostages being taken to ensure the fulfilment of the terms of settlements.

We give at page 120 an Engraving of a remarkable incident in this brief but stubborn war—the 71st Highland Light Infantry retaking the camp picket, on the heights over the Umbeylah Pass, on the afternoon of November 26. The crag picket, which was the key to our position, is situated on the summit of an almost precipitous hill about 700 ft. above ascent above our camp. The defensible part of the work consisted of a rough stone breastwork, called a sangah, including a space of about 60 square yards. The enemy, knowing well how necessary this position was to the security of the British forces, attacked it thirty-five times; their last and most determined attack took place on Nov. 26. The party occupying the work were completely outnumbered, and, after a considerable resistance, were driven out of it, with the loss of two officers killed and about forty killed and wounded. The 71st Highland Light Infantry, who had only just returned to camp from their twenty-four hours' picket duty, were immediately got under arms, and in less than half an hour were formed at the bottom of the hill, below the work. A few moments having been allowed them for rest, the order was given to advance. The nature of the ground rendered it impossible that they could equal their steadiness, in spite of the heavy fire which the enemy from the heights. The gallant General murderous fire of the enemy from the heights. The gallant General was present, and his presence was keenly watched, was the first man to enter the work. The enemy stood a moment, but only for a moment; the British bayonet was too much for them, and they fled, leaving the work, closely pursued by the Highlanders. In performing this service the 71st suffered severely, their Commander, Colonel Arnold, being killed, and about 280 bayonets.

Our picket stands on the same page shows the Chumla Valley and the village of Umbeylah, as seen from the position held by the British force on the Gerco heights.

"THE MEETING OF ABRAHAM'S SERVANT WITH REBEKAH AT THE WELL."

To quote here the whole of the description of the circumstances under which Abraham obtained for his son Isaac a wife of his own race, would be to copy the whole of the twenty-fourth chapter of the patriarch dwelt, is not necessary to the understanding of the picture engraved on page 113. Abraham, "old and well stricken in years." Even the most careless reader must needs find this at least one of the most interesting and pleasing of scriptural idyls, commonly full of import as describing the pastoral life, manners, and relation of the sexes among the earliest races on record, as indicating the high social position of the earliest races on record, as indicating the high social position of the women of the time above all, as revealing in this grey dawn of antiquity, the fact of monotheistic worship, the firm belief in the Supreme Being as the noblest heritage of any people or any period of man's history.

To the more abstruse and religious Bible-reader the narrative is, of course, familiar, as illustrating the miraculous and deeply significant intervention of the Lord. How Eliezer, having promises to Abraham to make him the father of a mighty nation, innumerous as the sand by the seashore, and that from all the nations of the earth should be blessed. All the circumstances of the journey, the arrival at Jerusalem, the prayer, all are remarkable, miraculous. That very Isaac for whom the servant of Abraham seeks a wife was the father of two celebrated sons, one of whom sold a birthright for a mess of lentils—a sacrificial knife. Abraham sends the "eldest servant of his house" into Mesopotamia, and it is his brother Nahor's city that he enters, and the angel of the Lord of heaven going before him, and taking away the spirit of fear, worship, and belief in God with him. The servant, when he arrives "without the city," and has made his camp by the well, "made his camp to kneel down in the evening, even the time that women go out to draw water," prays to the "Lord God of my master Abraham," and asks that the maiden who, "when I say unto thee, let me drink; and she shall say, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink also: let the same be she that thou hast appointed for thy servant Isaac." And this prayer was miraculously answered in the most beautiful and touching manner. The conduct of the beautiful virgin Rebekah. When the man was convinced that this was the maiden to whom he had been sent, he bowed down his head to the ground, and worshipped the Lord.

The story goes on to tell of the journey, and with what measure the servant of Abraham received from Laban and Bethuel, his sister and her father, the hospitality which he craved.

This is the moment chosen by the painter, and with what measure it has been rendered by him our Engraving. It will, however, be at once perceived that the artist, Mr. Leifchild, has subordinated the figures, the landscape, and other accessories, have little pretence to that strictly realistic character which is the distinguishing feature of modern Art, and which, though to a certain extent desirable, may yet, when carried to excess, be found to be inconsistent with the concentrated conception. This picture is nevertheless a great advance in probable realism upon the conventionalities of the early masters of the mediæval and Renaissance painters. The composition is certainly good, and the attitudes and expressions of the figures are natural and free from affectation, and her damsels, are appropriate and varied. The more technical qualities of the picture—its grace-ful drawing, its harmonious arrangement of colour, its delicate light and solid texture—are especially noteworthy. The painter's conception of the purport of his subject is clear, and he has evinced much greater advantage in this easel picture than in those vast altar-pieces of which Germany is full, and which, though they have their merits, are generally associated.

It was as a class for British religious, poetical, and historical painting during the career of William Hilton. Though he was devoted to such subjects, Hilton was not a painter of the school preferred by a distinguished crayon-painter and engraver, and became a student of the Royal Academy at the early age of fifteen, and was elected an associate of the Royal Academy in 1803 when only seventeen, and very soon after was remarkable, in the opinion of his professional brethren, for "a fine feeling for colour, and a certain nobility of execution"; yet, during a working life of nearly forty years, he met with little public appreciation or serviceable encouragement. The Royal Academy recognised his merit and made him an R.A., but the public neglected him. Even the British Gallery is enabled him to obtain, in succession to Fuseli, the keepership of the Academy, but he was unequal to the duties and resigned, soon after having him from positive destitution. At Hilton's death most of his best pictures were sold by auction, and the sale of many of his works became familiar with such great mural paintings as are to some his finest work in the Palace, Westminster, and in other parts of our country. Time has, however, come to be better understood and appreciate the noble functions of that art which is now so generally spoken of with a sneer as "High Art."

THE CHAUDIÈRE GOLD-FIELDS, CANADA.

THE Chaudière is a considerable stream, which has its source in Lake Megantic, and flows northward into the River St. Lawrence, which it joins at Point Levi, opposite Quebec. Its course is for the most part through a country which has been found to yield gold in greater or lesser quantities. Forty-eight years ago a considerable amount of gold-dust was found in Gold Creek, which she sold for a trifle as a curious stone. In 1834, another woman found a large nugget which she appropriated to her use. The gold fields of California had not then been opened up, nor those of Australia discovered, but good judges were of opinion that the gold in small quantities was formed for exploring and working for gold on the Chaudière. Considerable capital was expended, and a company was formed in 1863, but the enterprise broke the directors to declare a dividend. The operations were discontinued, and the gold-seekers left the field. Recently, however, operations have been resumed, and the Chaudière is now attracting much attention. The operations were discontinued, and the gold-seekers left the field. Recently, however, operations have been resumed, and the Chaudière is now attracting much attention.

Since the abandonment of the company's works a few of the neighbouring habitants have made considerable quantities by means of washing with tin pans. As few strangers visited the locality, they managed to keep their operations secret, and when a visitor to the party struck upon a deposit so rich that secrecy was no longer possible. The gold was found in small quantities by means of washing and threatens to break out again with increased fury whenever gold-washing can be resumed. Gold-washing machines are now being used in Canada, Sir W. Logan, have shown that the gold is found generally in the district south of Quebec, that it is not confined to quartz veins, and that a doubtful whether, excepting in the valley of the Chaudière, it will be found in sufficient quantity to warrant the expenditure of capital in its working.

During last season the men engaged to give one fourth of the gold found as tribute: as this, however, depended entirely upon their own good faith, it is impossible to estimate the average yield per man. One party of four, during eleven days' work, gave up 2 lb. 9 oz. as tribute; another party of five, during three days' work, gave 1 lb. 7 oz. Some others gave quantities more or less reasonable, but by far the greater number made no return whatever.

The Town of Beauce has been the centre of operations for gold-digging on one of the small tributaries of the Chaudière, and the residences of the diggers on the bank of the river.

MEMORIAL CROSS OF THE 8TH REGIMENT AT FRANCFORT.

THE 8th Regiment was raised, mostly in Derbyshire, in the year 1685. It formed part of the army of the Duke of Marlborough, and was present at the victories of Ramilies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet. In 1715 the regiment received from King George I. the title of "The King's," and the badge of the white horse.

In May, 1857, when the great Sepoy mutiny broke out, the King's Regiment was quartered at Allahabad, in the Punjaub. The native troops at that station, consisting of one regiment of cavalry and two of infantry, mutinied on the night of June 8. The King's were then ordered to join the camp before Delhi, where it arrived on June 28. After the capture of Delhi the regiment formed part of the column which, under the orders of Lieutenant-Colonel Greathed, was dispatched to the relief of Lucknow, then besieged by a large native army, the force assembling at Cawnpore for the relief of Lucknow. On Sept. 28 the regiment was present at the battle of Bolumbaur. On Oct. 16, at the regiment was present at the battle of Bolumbaur. On Oct. 16, at the repulse of the attack on Agra made by the Gwalior rebels; on Nov. 16, at the relief of Lucknow by Sir Colin Campbell, and on Nov. 17 at the action at the Alumbagh. On Dec. 2, at the defeat of the Gwalior Contingent at Cawnpore; on Jan. 2 and 3, 1858, at the action of the Kalee Nuddee, on the occasion of Rohilcund. The Kent Lancers, the King's, and the 75th Regiment were the only British troops engaged in the action. The capture of Dudu was the last relief of Lucknow.

The cross, designed and constructed by Mr. Leifchild, of which we give an Engraving on page 129, is intended to commemorate the services and death of the 8th officers, non-commissioned officers, and private soldiers lost by the regiment while engaged in these arduous and glorious operations. The shaft of the cross is of the green oak of Irish bog, and the buttresses to the arms of Robin Hood stone. The base is of granite, with bands of green marble, and supports the shaft. The relieves represent, in appropriate encampment, the battle, the burial. On the other three sides of the shaft are cut the names of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates who were lost by the regiment during the mutiny. The height of the cross is twenty feet.

Thinking that the memorial of the services of the regiment in the Army, was the most suitable place for a monument intended to commemorate military services, application applied for permission to erect the cross in the centre of the east side of the eastern quadrangle. The consideration of the matter was left to the Queen. To make the application seem, however, to have had no weight with the commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, which, on a previous occasion, refused the applied for. There being no other metropolitan site which appeared suitable for a regimental memorial, the Queen decided in favour of Frankfort, the garrison chapel, where, as the recommendation of Major-General Lord W. Paulet, a site had been granted them by the Secretary for War.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

WHEN all the acceptances have appeared, the Ring, which has been considerably enlarged for the forthcoming meeting of the Jockey Club, appears set to business in earnest on the handicaps. The Derby betting has been of a less brisk character than usual. Velocity is very firm, been of a less brisk character than usual. Velocity is very firm, but there is a strong disinclination to back Coastguard, although the mere Heath lookers-on do not seem to be much impressed with him. Honest Isaac and Sir Hugo are neglected. Ely's name is scarcely ever heard, and Yorkshire is very much divided in its notions of Claremont, Chelsea, and Velocity. Many seem to have given considerable satisfaction. ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

NEWSPAPER-WRITERS need little more inspiration than had my Lord Chesterfield (when he foretold the French Revolution) to prophesy a rock beforehand forthcoming events. Like Hamlet, who could interpret well enough if he only "saw the puppets dallying," we see the shadow passimmune and can construe the action. We noted last week that amongst the echoes of this would be heard the thunder of the German and Danish cannon. It is even so. There is war in Europe, notwithstanding that we are in the middle of the nineteenth century, and in spite of 51, and 62, and all the fermentation about "universal peace." And yet every one is ready to own that the logic which issues from the mouth of a cannon is about the last reasoning in the world. The noses of war are but blind fabulæ in nasu, without any true reason. Yet we have fighting; and even in the Queen's family, the Princess Royal of England must wage battle oppositely to the young mother and future Queen of England, her sister; and Princess Louise of Hesse-Cassel and Prince Frederick are divided against Albert Edward Prince of Wales. This is all very sad. The war may be fought reason enough as yet; when it shall be fought out, there ever existed any war which arbitration might have stopped, but was not? In which connection, Punch, who is the oracle of "Vesperfilio" said some time ago, has written a poem. "Peace or no peace," he very justly tells us, "is in utter helplessness." Vesperfilio, therefore, and hence his signature, proposed to imitate Punch; but, as he showed adventurous enough to "go" to Denmark, he does not a bird, nor an animal, but a fish. Fishes fly through the water quite as freely, despite literal incredulity, as birds through the air, and then the heavier part of their own bodies; and we may hint so far with our esoteric brethren, who only understand the Queen's English and with parabolical ends, we hope soon to see an aerial voyage accomplished, and that which Dr. Wynter, Punch, and Vesperfilio have failed to do, accomplished by John Bull.

From New York we have no more recent news, upon which one or two of our contemporaries have naturally commented. Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, that well-known New York preacher, who, as the Americans say, is everybody knows, his income, to the amount of £1500 a year, from a proprietary chapel in which, annually he, a real auctioneer, puts the seat up to sale, and knocks down to the highest bidder. As his fervour and popularity increase, so the pews "go up;" and it would be considered a bad speculation indeed to enable "war Christians" to "sit under" H. W. Beecher are very much under par, the proprietor considers. Mr. Beecher has espoused the squabble in the Temple; hence the world-wide exposition of how they change "seats" and sell seats in the temple of worship in New York. The "minister," it turns out, does not place his candle under a bushel, but, in addition to his profitable pulpit, has established one in multifarious subjects. Surely, our badly-paid Curates and lecturers in multifarious subjects. Surely, our badly-paid Curates or over-paid Bishops are better than this. Is not the money which is given to the Church to be spent by the beloved of the Bishop or in the pulpit of the poor? But then, you see, money is the "spirit" over the water in the New York, where the Gospel preached to them, not the poor; and if the eloquent preacher "allows" to brighter world," it is but justice that he should receive an allowance "to show the way." The whole report is worth studying; it will make an Englishman more than ever proud of the name of National Church.

Although we still hope against hope, there is small doubt but that Dr. Livingstone is dead, and that he carried to the scene of his labours that earnest heart and gentle mind which, in spite of suffering, Professor Owen has just received the last—yet let us hope not the last—head of game which the Doctor will ever bring to bag. He is, indeed, a large crocodile about thirty or forty years of age, shocked, as it ought to be, at the cruelty of the world, and, as for the creatures are slow growers, and the Doctor has not passed the gentle period of strength, of this monster thing that it had not passed the gentle period of its youth. The rumour from the Cape that Livingstone perished with his faithful people gains credence from the absence of news.

As the little boys—those quick-witted juveniles who, like Moth in Shakspeare's comedy, take pleasure in coining new words—say in their way, there is again a "row in the buildings" about our great poet's new centenary. This time Stratford offers the bone of contention. It is not this time nine stalwart literary gentlemen, professors and clue, who withdraw, in one angry thought, from the Committee, but Mr. Phelps has refused to play at the Stratford commemoration because he is not to be allowed to play legal characters, as at Drury Lane, but is to be the country to play Hamlet on such an occasion without first offering the choice of characters to some full-blooded "star." Mr. Phelps is right in, perhaps, not the judgment of Solomon in publishing this, but there is the wrath of Samuel. The good old Committee of Nine will be revived. The public will be considered. Not the least curious part of this correspondence is the fact that the "clergyman—Mr. Phelps" mentions—dates his letters from "Bedford Chapel," and upon whom Mr. Phelps throws much of the blame, acts as London secretary.

Poets may be happy in the enduring glory of a name, but they are not so in the meanness of their personal affairs. Byron, Scott, and Byron left but daughters, and the two first are now unrepresented on earth. Of the two last children, not one left a child to bear it, and the leaves drop off in summer rather than in winter. Adelaide Anne Procter (the daughter of Barry Cornwall, and herself a writer of poetess) is dead. She died at her father's house, on Tuesday last. As regards and keeping, Adelaide Anne Procter was one of the contributors to the "Victoria Regia," but chiefly as a true and sweet woman-poet, one may drop tears for her, and not a few will do so. Her life was short, but with the happy dead. Her poet-father, who is nearing his seventy-fifth year, mourns her with a sorrow we will not disturb.

In connection with the shocking catastrophe at Santiago, wherein so many thousands lost their lives through a curious combination of superstition and camphine, people with long memories note that the peasant Joyce resided for some time at Rome, where he was one of an ecclesiastical mission by Pope Pius VII. Hence, perhaps, the fervour of the Christian devotion which led him to proclaim the Pio Nono—the Immaculate Conception.

One or two unpleasant notes shall not our echoes for this week. The first imminent of the Peabody gift will, in a fortnight or three weeks, be laid before the public. As buildings—and we are only providing the families of the poor with decent—nay, excellent—cheap lodging, will be opened at Bethnal-green. The verses signed "Jin," on Thackeray, wherein that author is placed above Fielding and Walter Scott, were from the pen of Lord Houghton. (Monckton Milnes). It is something that so accomplished a critic should so worthily judge a contemporary. Steps are also about to be taken for the erection of a marble bust of Thackeray in Westminster.

The Queen has approved of Mr. Charles Aylwin Creighton as Consul at Halifax, Nova Scotia, for the King of Prussia. The Queen has also approved of Mr. Rudolph Albert de Cronenberg as Consul at Sierra Leone, for the King of the Netherlands. Arthur Rennebach as Consul at Sierra Leone, for the King of the Netherlands.

THE FARM.

THE movements in favour of the repeal of the malt tax and the law of hypothec seem to be the most prominent topics north and south of Tweed. The letter of Mr. Henry Woods, on sheep management, has been decidedly the one of the season, and, following upon his recent speech at the Mansion House and Kennington and Islington, it had special weight. Mr. William Smith has, as usual, been busy writing letters as long as the ancient respecting his native city and gives as his reason for not entering the Royal lists at Newcastle that he does not wish to end his days in a workhouse. Lady Pigott's eloquence did not depart with the old year and Pride of Southwicke and it has just been appointed Commissioner to inquire into the building of a school, library, and reading-room at Cowbridge.

The Athelstaneford herd has had most success this week and white Princess of Athelstane," by Knight of Athelstane from Pride of Athelstane, which was calved in May last, and is the property of Mr. Stirling of Kier's celebrated first-prize Battersea and Kelso bull, "Forth," by Lord Lyon—Princess Royal, by Knight of Athelstane—has left for Stirlyton last Tuesday. One of his bull-calves made nearly 100 gs. at Kelso last year. It was out and very much admired by everyone of the many of the herd being connected with him, through John o' Groat and Princess Royal. It is rather remarkable that four such well-known Royal English Society winners as Forth, Windsor Augustus, Minichioe, and Whipper-in should all be the property of Scotch breeders, as also that three such as Forth's sire and grandsire, Florist and Hiawatha. It is stated that Mr. Richard Booth has, in addition to his Shorthorn herd, Mr. Richard Booth has, in addition to his Shorthorn herd, Mr. Richard Booth has, in addition to his Shorthorn herd,

VIEW OF THE CHILIAN CORDILLERA, FROM SANTIAGO.

The Chilian Cordillera forms a part of the Andes (termed by the Spaniards the Cordillera de los Andes), the great mountain system of South America, which extends through sixty-five degrees of latitude along its western coast, from Cape Horn to the Isthmus of Panama, with a breadth varying from forty to four hundred miles, forming along the highest part a length of 4360 miles, and covering, with its chains, plateaus, and declivities, nearly a sixth part of that continent.

A RAILWAY IN THE ANDES.

The Valparaiso and Santiago Railway—of the partial opening of which some Illustrations were given in this Journal in 1856—has been completed throughout, and was opened by the President of the Republic upon the 14th of September last with great ceremony. Its length is somewhat over 114 miles, and, as its course lies through a portion of the Chain of the Andes, it offers, in some respects, features seldom encountered upon works of this nature. Upon it are five tunnels, several viaducts of 70, 80, and 126 feet in height, and an incline of twelve miles in length, rising 125 ft. per mile, and attaining an altitude of 2640 ft. above the level of the Pacific Ocean. It is, therefore, one of the highest railways in the world at present in use; and, with one exception—that of the Copiapo Extension, also in Chili, which is 4400 ft. in height—it crosses the loftiest summit yet passed by the locomotive in either North or South America. The passage of the mountain range of Tabon, between Valparaiso and the capital, was a very formidable undertaking, and in accomplishing this the chief difficulties have been surmounted. For some miles the line climbs along the face of precipitous cliffs, at a considerable height above their base, while above it tower rugged porphyry cliffs more than 1000 ft. in height, the favourite haunt of condors, eagles, and other birds of prey. Here there are three tunnels in quick succession; and at one point occurs the Maquis Viaduct, an iron structure 126 ft. in altitude, 600 ft. in length, and which presents the rare features of being curved to a radius of 600 ft. and, on account of the incline over it, of being about 14 ft. higher at one end than the other. The superstructure of this viaduct is tubular, the principal span being 150 ft., and it is the first example of a tubular bridge erected in South America.

A considerable portion of the funds employed upon the construction of this railway have been furnished from England through the house of Baring Brothers; and its total expense has exceeded two millions sterling. It has occupied nearly eleven years in making, and it is by far the most important line of railway communication yet accomplished by any of the South American Republics.

The Illustrations on the next page of the Tabon Incline and the Maquis Viaduct are taken from drawings executed by Mr. Boulet, one of the draughtsmen of the Chilian Government, and they faithfully represent two of the principal features of the railway, which has been executed under the direction of Mr. Lloyd, formerly assistant of the late Robert Stephenson, and a member of the Institution of Civil Engineers, who occupies the position of Engineer-in-Chief for the Government.

FINE ARTS.

THE so-called "executive" of the London Shakspeare Committee advertised a meeting of the site and monument committees, to take place about the time (yesterday) at which this portion of our Number goes to press; and invited artists and others willing to submit suggestions to forward the same to the secretaries. In the present indefiniteness of the prospects, intentions, subscriptions, and everything relating to the London memorial, its executive can hardly expect many "artists or others" will expend much time, or thought, or skill in making suggestions or designs which have so little chance of being carried out. If it were likely that a memorial would at this—almost the eleventh—hour be serviceable, we would say why, in connection having been chosen ready to our hand as the New Palace, Westminster; and further, that, having relinquished the hope of ever being able to find room for a statue to the Poet in the Abbey, the space he has received in advance. This sad intelligence will probably be taken as suggesting a sufficient explanation for a delay which has called forth some severe animadversions.

Mr. Frederick Goodall, A.R.A., is engaged upon an important picture for the next Royal Academy exhibition; the subject is the same as that of the picture by Hilton engraved in modern times for the Art-Union Meeting Rebekah at the Well." Mr. Frederick Leighton is also painting for the forthcoming exhibition a picture of Cimabue and Giotto passing the "Banishment of Dante from Florence." This picture represents the Florentine poet on his way to Verona, with the promise to surpass any recent work by this artist. Mr. Frith, R.A., is painting a picture representing the scene described in "Ivanhoe," of the meeting of King Richard I. with Robin Hood and the outlaws, which will present numerous figures. It is intended for exhibition next May. And among other contributions which may be expected at the same exhibition, is the little picture of a subject from "Much Ado," by Mr. E. M. Ward, R.A., to which we alluded the other day; three works by Mr. Calderon; four or more by Mr. Solomon J. Solomon; others by Mr. D. Roberts, R.A.; Mr. G. F. Watts, and Mr. Marks.

A correspondent of the Manchester Guardian writes, under date January 7:—"Is the National Gallery fireproof?" If it is not it certainly should be made so, else the fate of its priceless treasures, in the event of a fire in the Houses of Parliament may befall it. The danger from such fire is increased by the residence of two families in the building—that of the keeper of the Royal Academy pictures, and that of the assistant secretary of the National Gallery in the western half of the building, immediately under the pictures in the larger of which, at least, there are several children. A Royal Academy porter is also lodged there separately, we believe, with his family, and not to be mentioned officials. Apropos of the National Gallery, we think it desirable that the collection of foreign pictures, now lodged in the national collection (the British School) located at South Kensington, should be also vested with proper accommodation. A space is said to be left for that edition of the catalogue at South Kensington inquired for the last edition of the catalogue, and exhausted in a few twice or thrice at intervals of some weeks, and consequently the new catalogue at all events ought to be ready, that a new edition would shortly be published. At Trafalgar-square the pictures constituting the Prince Consort's gift were not ready in the larger gallery on the opening of the gallery after the autumnal holidays, and we do not know if they have yet been arranged. What is responsible for these irregularities? Surely the duties of the secretary of the National Gallery cannot be very exclusive."

Another new art-periodical, to be published under the title of The Art-Review, was, by Mr. Cundall, announced to the public to appear immediately after the opening of Parliament.

The annual exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water Colours has been an average good one. The sales amounted to £2400. During the one month of cheap admissions, as many as 18,000 persons, mostly by the Birmingham and Art-Union ticket-holders, 18,269 persons, mostly of the working class, visited the exhibition.

MUSIC.

The sixth Session of THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON began, on Monday last week, with an orchestral concert at St. James's Hall. This society has grown to great magnitude, and appears to be in a flourishing condition. The number of members are above a thousand in number. The orchestra, composed of the most eminent performers on their respective instruments, is equally strong, under the able direction of Mr. Alfred Mellon; and the list of amateur chorus singers is large (and the list all complete) and carefully selected from the best of the vocal talent of the metropolis, as regards not only novelty: the only novelty since we last noticed the society's doings was "Le Medecin Malgre lui." Being the work of a composer whose music at present excites much curiosity, this overture ought to have been accompanied with a copy of the words—a copy but it was placed at the very fag end of the concert, and played amid the noise and bustle of the departure of the audience, so that it was impossible to form any idea of its merits. When we hear so much extol it will not be much more favourably considered. The other novelties of the concert—the pièce de résistance—was Spohr's symphony "De Vel der Tone" (the Power of Sound), which occupied more than an hour in performance, formed nearly the whole second part of the concert. It is one of the composer's most elaborate and ingenious, but extensive length and very elaborate style render it somewhat heavy and fatiguing to the listener. Spohr's music is not appreciated besides Germans—Beethoven's to "Coriolanus" and Meyerbeer's to "Struensee," both compositions of acknowledged excellence, to which ample justice was done by the band. The only vocal performance—a concerto in D minor was performed by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, a young lady of London birth, who proved herself a pianist of the first class. She is a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, where she has greatly distinguished herself and acquired a reputation for her musical scholarship. She played with a fine touch, great delicacy and refinement, and with a vivacity and precision which, in the finale, were Mme. Parepa and Mr. Santley—the former sang the great scena from Beethoven's "Richard Coeur de Lion" (which is far more rudlior than the cherry," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea;" and they joined in a duet from Rossini's "Semiramide."

The MONDAY POPULAR CONCERT of this week was a "Mozart night"—that is, the whole of the programme being selected from the works of Mozart. The first concert was a "Beethoven concert; for what has Mozart ever written that is not charming? The chief object of attraction was the performance of Miss Arabella Goddard, the announcement of whose name is at all times sufficient to fill a concert-room. On this occasion she played no less than three times—first, Mozart's Sonata in B flat (No. 8 of Hallé's edition); next, the Rondo in A minor for the pianoforte alone; and, lastly, she was joined by M. Vieuxtemps; and, lastly, the pianoforte part of the quartet in G minor. In all these pieces the lady's admirable pianist was applauded with the usual enthusiasm. The remaining instrumental piece was the beautiful Quintet in A major for the clarinet, two violins, viola, and violoncello, played by Lazarus, Vieuxtemps, Ries, Webb, and Pagge—a perfect performance, which delighted the audience. The vocalists were Mdme. Florence Lancia and Mr. Santley, who sang several beautiful airs, selected chiefly from "Figaro" and "Don Giovanni."

The Benevolent Fund of the SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY is in a prosperous condition. Previously to the annual general meeting of the governors, held last week in Exeter Hall, it appears that nearly £700 had already been applied to charitable objects, and that an invested fund had been accumulated to the amount of £2300, Consols.

The fifty-fourth anniversary of the birth of Mendelssohn was commemorated on Wednesday last by a performance of "Elijah" at Exeter Hall, Mr. Benedict the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin. The principal singers were Mdme. Rudersdorff, Miss Emma Heywood, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Weiss. The instrumental band and chorus consisted of 700 performers.

Mr. ALCHLAR'S pianoforte performances, which we have already noticed with due eulogy, are continued with undiminished success at his residence in Westbourne-square. The following was the programme of Tuesday last, from which an idea may be formed of the character of these performances:—Beethoven's Sonata in F minor, Op. 57; Chertzinow's Andante Grave by Mr. Aguilar; manuka, nocturne, and impromptu, by Chopin; Aguilar's fantasies; "The Bloo Bells," "The Harebell," and "The Cowslip;" Mozart's air, sonata in A, selection from Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte;" and fantasia on "Faust," by Liszt. The vocal music, we regret, were omitted with fashionable company.

The Morning Post of the Press says :—"A dinner was given at the residence of M. Rossini, there being present the three greatest composers of the day—the host himself, Mr. Meyerbeer, and M. Auber. Rossini proposed a toast, and Meyerbeer declared that he had not yet found the female singer he had so long been in search of to take the part of Norma, and suggested that Mdme. Patti, "would probably be brought out before the "Africaine."

THE THEATRES.

ST. JAMES'S.—The theatres are now commencing the dramatic season in earnest. The pantomimes are, indeed, in full flower, and are likely to retain possession of the boards for even a longer period than in previous years. The Haymarket, however, has already that the course of dramatic development has strengthened materially even since the Christmas holidays. The new piece produced on a show of work should be made. On Saturday a serious comedy, from the pen of Mr. Tom Taylor, was brought here, and with a result, I favourable reception. It is called "The Silver Lining," and is illustrative of a disputed point in the law of libel. The subject. The subject is adapted from a French drama to English manners, and is simple enough. The hero, Sir Geoffrey Dering, enjoys the quiet state of mind of a gentleman who had years ago been jilted by a faithless coquette. Arthur Melville (Mr. Chippendale) gains the affections of the fair young creature, and doubts the fidelity of woman and the virtue of man. Nevertheless, he is disposed to venture on matrimony himself, and is wooed by Miss Dering (Miss Charles Mathews), and agrees to his friend Frank Fairlegh (Mr. C. Mathews) marrying her. Mrs. Melville (Miss Adelaide Cottrell), Mr. Melville's infects his newly-wedded wife with his sceptical opinions, and Sterling had been afflicted during the early days of matrimony with about him. There is, however, a fascinating widow of their acquaintance, Mrs. Ormsby Gore (Miss Kate Kerby), who proves to be too much for the husband's philosophy. She succeeds in showing him that love made him jealous, and that he was in love with his wife. The injury he has done to his friend Fairlegh by the third act. The latter comes to a more reasonable perception of life. There is also a part acted by Mrs. Frank Matthews—that of Gabriel Grub, the Old Bachelor, who is a character-sketch. The new drama is admirably acted throughout, and Mr. Charles Mathews is especially excellent. The scene in the first act between Fairlegh, with whom rests the moral implied in the title. Mrs. Stirling has been difficult to play the lively and fascinating widow impressive; while Mrs. C. Mathews, in the variety of mental emotion, as the wife of Fairlegh, was unsurpassable. The piece probably be thought expedient to abridge the dialogue; but the success was decided. The house was numerously and fashionably filled.

ASTLEY'S.—Mr. E. T. Smith has employed Mr. John Brougham to translate for him a piece by Dion Boucicault, which is entitled "The Might of Right; or, the Soul of Honour." That there is a good deal of the Might of Right in the piece, and that it is rich in the materials of the plot, which are complex, are arranged with skill. At the time of the play, Mr. Clara Vyvyan (Miss Rainforth) is Rakes suspects of loving Mr. Clara Vyvyan (Miss Rainforth) in whom he has set his heart; and in order to get rid of Paul, who is a sailor, he mounts him on a vicious horse; but his animal is frightened by the report of his supposed victim, who shoots the dangerous animal through the head. The fall from the horse kills the lady for whom he protests Clara, when Paul hesitates, but accepts the challenge, exchanges fire, and is left on his knees by his foe, who is struck by Willoughby determines on compromising the lady's honour. He then takes to score himself with Clara, and succeeds in inducing her lover a sealed packet which her mother, when dying, had given to her, and which packet contains the will of Clara's father, wrongly executed by her husband and now in Rakes's possession. Sir Willoughby, overhearing this revelation, is thrown into an unpremeditated fit, and Rakes, who has left the room, is found actually attends at the rendezvous, and, failing, loses a duplicate of the Mysterious letter. Sir Willoughby, finding the lady dead on the witnessed what he supposed was a parting between Sir Willoughby and Clara, he gives her his handkerchief to bind up his face in his assistance. A twelvemonth afterwards Paul turns up again, disguised as a gipsy, and discovers the packet containing the will in a set of masters. The result may be guessed. He is employed by Rakes to destroy it, but, finding Clara's handkerchief, and recognising in her the dress, is mistaken for a spectre. The thief act brings the retribution. Sir Willoughby is about to marry Clara, when Rakes arrives with Paul, and Paul discovers in Alice a lady whom he had formerly loved under romantic circumstances. This drama is composed of various melodramatic elements, and is full of exciting incidents. The success of the piece was greatly owing to Mr. Lorraine, in the two characters of Rakes and the Mysterious Stranger, who acted in strong relief. The scenery, by J. Gates and Mr. C. James, is well painted, and the other characters are filled by Mr. Leigh Murray and Miss different situations were all ably provided.

STANDARD.—"The White Scarf," the new piece produced at this theatre, is translated from the French, and in two acts. Eloise (Miss Page), an orphan and protegée of Mdme. Jeannette, receives from her first lover a white scarf, which accompanies the bouquet with which she amuses herself before her bedroom looking-glass, dressing her costume for the approaching ball. Mdme. Jeannette, in the room overhears these words and uses them again to her in the next act, when she is in the presence of the lover who sent the mysterious. She causes the man to be arrested on suspicion, when the scarf is found in the possession of Eloise, who confesses to his head. Hereupon, the character of Alice is cleared to the satisfaction of the lover, who proposes to marry her. The piece is dependent on the acting of Miss Page for its success.

CITY OF LONDON.—This theatre is attracting large audiences by the merit of the performances. Mr. Tom Trot, and her Comical Cat," and an afterpeice by Mr. M. Lee, jun., on the subject of "Faust," which Mr. Lee has requested here to come to the City to see. It is a picturesque manner.

The Queen's new drama was produced on Monday, written by Mr. A. C. Troughton and entitled "Unlimited Confidence." It is named a comedietta, but has more matter in it than a four-act comedy. The treating the subject, however, the author treads on "delicate ground;" but he moves adroitly, and thus escapes offence. The plot turns on the equivocal position of an aunt, who passes in Bath society as an unmarried lady, but who is, in fact, a mother, without the means of bringing up her child. Mrs. Tufts has just returned America, with her infant charge, places her in a "fix," to escape from the Custom-house requisite here since the passing of the Act. Child. This proves the source of much inconvenience to the young lady, who has called her adopted daughter. Mrs. Tufts, however, who would be her lover, but is seriously alarmed by the story of her having a child. She can give him no explanation, but requires "unlimited confidence." Ultimately, it turns out that this young officer's own uncle is the father of the child; and his appearance on the scene with the aunt is sufficient to exculpate the self-sacrificing niece, Florence (Miss Marie Wilton), in the eyes of Lieutenant Hillyard (Mr. Farrelly), Colonel Daures, the uncle, of somewhat an excitable temperament, had an excellent representative in Mr. Belford; nor was the part of Aunt Jefferson at all ill done by Miss L. Thorne, whose prudery was satisfactorily sustained. Dramatic honours were duly awarded to the four performers on the fall of the curtain.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE loss so recently experienced by our literature will naturally direct the eyes of all magazine readers to the Cornhill. A black border gives conventional evidence of the public bereavement, corresponding to the bush which good wine is said not to require. "Philip, My Boy," the novel which Thackeray began on the day of the departed, and who will not wish to hear what they have to say? Mr. Dickens writes a touching account of a letter, and records the instinctive felicity which never deserts him when addressing himself directly to the public. The paper does not betray much critical insight, and is chiefly remarkable for the assurance, very gratifying if well founded, that the posthumous fragment is "much the best" of even Thackeray's writings. We shall soon have an opportunity of appreciating the value of this judgment. Mr. Trollope writes of Thackeray with the enthusiasm of a disciple, tempered by the discriminations so peculiarly his own. Mr. Hannay said nothing which did not display a spirit of criticism in the paper, and which was expressed the general sentiment with point and accuracy. The purest instalment of his fiction we have ever written. Mr. Payn is a novelist to watch month. "Margaret Denzil" is continued with much ability, while "Cousin Phillis" is the most delightful. Of the rest of the miscellaneous papers are "A Trip to Xanadu" and "Extenuating Circumstances." The former is a really fine account of the ruins—or, rather, preservation amid ruin—of Akbar's palace at Agra. The latter contains some droll instances of the ingenuity of juvenile pens in discovering circumstances of mitigation in the very enormity of the offence, in which we think we see the coincident unconsciously. We fancy it may be partly explained by the gross unfairness of English juvenile criticism, which takes a spirit of revenge in its journeys. We have rarely seen a report of a French trial in which the magistrate did not seem to be virtually acting as counsel for the prisoner. "Tony Butler" is a beautiful specimen of the late Lady David Gray.

Macmillan's also brings its pair of immortelles to the great artist's tomb; and, to speak our minds, Mr. Henry Kingsley and Mr. Masson, the biographer of Milton, Chatterton, and Drummond of Hawthornden, have surpassed them in the soundness of their criticism. Mr. Kingsley commences with "Ravenshoe," like a hero. It must have come to him like a revelation of the world on the threshold of which he was standing, to read the recollections of such a pitiful fulness of sentiment which enables him to bring out the real sensibility of this apparently hard-natured writer. Many of his descriptions are characterised by a subtlety which shows that he has thought more deeply on the art of fiction than the heir-less has brought to the consideration of it had hitherto to suppose. There is little to remark in this month's instalment of his novel beyond the evidence of actual experience in the Life Book of the Soil" strikes deeper chords of feeling, while the interest is of a quieter description. Mr. Masson's paper on Chatterton will, from an inspection of French schools, Mr. Arnold advocates an attempt to bring the primary education of France under the supervision of the State. Perhaps some more precise information as to the way in which this is going to be done would be desirable. We cannot think it cannot be carried out without the voluntary co-operation of the schoolmasters, and that they will be likely to be worked without a strong pressure upon them from public opinion. The advantages of strong pressure upon them from public opinion. The advantages of having such schools submitted to the inspection of men like Mr. Arnold are undeniable; but the difficulties in the way are no less so. Compulsory legislation on the subject would be tantamount to a revolution, and could not be thought of. "Competition Wallah" contributes a brilliant and very seasonable paper on the question of the military feeling between the natives of India. It is easier to deplore than to counteract the lamentable change which has come over the spirit of our rule. We are gratified to find so strong a testimony borne to the impartiality and the generous sympathy with native feeling which, as a rule, our last example may not be always lost upon their countrymen.

One of the most interesting papers in the Edwin treats of India. It is a pretty picture of the simple, rural life of the inhabitants of Oude. More attention will, however, be directed to two articles of more general interest. It would lead us too far to discuss Mr. Bonamy Price "On the Political Temper of the Nation;" it shall only say that he seems to us to have put a keen hand his finger on the cause which threatens to reduce Parliament to a mere machine for registering the Ministerial decrees. Impossible without an infusion of new elements into the legislature. But the difficulty in the direction have hitherto defeated themselves, through a natural reaction against the unskilful application of experimental remedies. Mr. Hughes's paper suggests a way in an easy distinguished by practical energy tempered with statesmanlike moderation. The other leading article on the Volunteers is a needless exposure of the want of taste displayed in scorching up the weeds of the wretched system of Volunteering our public architecture, and of the wretched system of Volunteering our public architecture, and of the wretched system of Volunteering our public architecture. Some astounding examples of the reckless wastefulness of the present system are given; but we confess we see no reasonable prospect of a satisfactory substitute plan of carrying out public works, which the writer justly insists on as the best defence of the country. The other suggestion, the appointment of a permanent commissioner, is more likely to be carried into effect. "Lord Bacon" is a continuation of Mr. Spedding's valuable notice of Theodore Parker sums up the principal contents of a very engaging number.

Blackwood is also very good, and like Fraser, is distinguished by an important essay on a political question. That on "The Reform Question" is a temperate exposition of the report of the commissioners which has been received by all of those recommendations fairly on the Royal Academy, all of those recommendations fairly and honestly, and with a desire to doubt that they are, for the most part, acceptable to the profession. The proposal to abolish the examinations, however, is open to many with difficulties by no means easy to overcome. "Tony Butler" is as lively as ever; "Chronicles of Carlingford" is continued with spirit; and the first instalment of "Witchcraft Hall" is a striking story. Perhaps the most interesting of the miscellaneous papers is "A Ride through Dalmatia," a really grand delineation of the spacious loneliness of that waste of land, and the wretchedness of its people. There we have the word of commendation for the vivacity of Major O'Dowda's remarks upon things in general, and the very favourable review of the life of Charles the Bold," we shall have praised all the contents of the magazine, which is, indeed, a very excellent one this month.

The Dublin University, Bentley's Miscellany, and the New Monthly are, as usual, agreeable miscellanies; but, as many of their articles of interest, would be out of place in a review of this character.

The Indian Universities Magazine should, perhaps, be made in favour of "Wylder's Hand," which is at length concluded in the first-named of three periodicals, keeping the reader in a fever of excitement to the last. We are much inclined to accord it the first rank among the "sensational" novels of the day—the rather, perhaps, as it does not affect to be anything else. Sensational writings are consigned and remove sentences of death in an amusing paper on "evanescent literature," in the Rose, Shamrock, and Thistle. The writer exhibits an amusing unconsciousness of his or her envy fulness under the same category. It is, however, an animated performance, well calculated for the not wholly unprofitable amusement of an idle hour. The same may be said of the other contents of the magazine, especially of the "Sailor and Soldier" and "Gossip" columns. Society purveys a corresponding description of literature. Temple Bar relies mainly on its fiction for support. The "Trial of the Trelyngths" is concluded, and Mr. Yates's new story, "Broken into Harness," is announced in a way to justify very considerable expectation. The author seldom seems to us thus far the most pleasing that has hitherto proceeded from her pen. There is an amusing passage in which she pleasantly satirises her own style of fiction in a description of what is to be by no means unaware of its weak points nor destitute of an ambition after better things. In spite of this, however, we cannot see the resemblance to Temple Bar; while of the Sixpenny Magazine and the Intellectual Observer it is enough to observe that the names of their respective conductors seem to be well kept in sight, and accomplished with a fair measure of success.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LADY BRINCKMAN.

Annabella, Lady Brinckman, Countess Conlon, in the county of Salop, who died at the family seat, St. Leonards, Windsor, on the 23rd ult., was the only daughter and heir apparent of Admiral Lord Gambier, second son of John Gerbet, Esq., of Iwodstone, in the county of Salop, by his wife, Anne, daughter of the Very Rev. William Digby, of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire. The Gerbets rank among the oldest families in England, and have been settled in Hampshire since the time of Henry the Second. Lady Conlon, the wife of Lady Brinckman literally defunct, accompanied William the Conqueror to England. Among the Norman knights who fought at the battle of Hastings was Sir Gerbet de Conlon, the ancestor of the one commemorated in Parliament as one of the Barons of Runnymede in the 52nd year of Edward I.'s reign. Lady Brinckman was, on the maternal side, descended in a direct line from the Earls of Pembroke, the families of Seymour and Ward. Her Ladyship married, on March 18, 1841 (the year she succeeded to the Conlon title), Admiral Sir Francis Augustus Brinckman, of North-Brinton, in the county of York, by whom she leaves no issue. The remains of the lamented Baroness have been interred at Hailsham, on the Sussex coast, which has lately been restored, at the cost of £8000, through her munificence.

LADY MERCOTTH.

Dollgny, Lady Mercotth, died on the 26th ult. at a very advanced age, at her residence, Grosvenor-street, Grovenor-square, was the second daughter and co-heir of Colonel Thomas Hall, and was born in 1792. Colonel Hall was a distinguished officer of the Royal Navy in 1794, as part of the British squadron employed in the Mediterranean, and in 1796 was in the command of the brig of war Lively, in the Channel. Admiral Sir Alexander Hood, Bt. again joined his patron's flag-ship, and in 1800, while in command of the Valiant, 74 guns, captured the Hussard, French frigate, off the island of Tobago, in 1803. He was promoted to the rank of Lieutenant by Sir Thomas Hood, whom he had joined as a second lieut. and was appointed to the Alligator, which, under Captain C. Richardson, formed part of the force employed in the reduction of the Dutch colony of Surinam, in the course of which undertaking Henderson was severely wounded. The ensuing year he served on board the Circe, 18, in the Channel and Bay of Biscay, and subsequently in the Mediterranean, in the pursuit of the Rochefort squadron. He, to the early part of 1814, while cruising off Rochefort, in the Bellerophon, with the Mars and Monarch, in the capture of four heavy French frigates. In the following November he was made Captain of the Tagus, and appointed to the Lord Gambier's squadron, employed in the Baltic. He was afterwards, as Lieutenant of the Centaur, as the surrender of Madeira. He was intrusted with the Sarah Sheriff, of 600 tons burden, by the Admiralty, for the purpose of a strong recommendation, which procured him a Commander's commission in 1809. He was made a Post-Capt. in the general promotion consequent upon the battle of Navarino. During the operations he particularly distinguished himself, and, in the year following, was entrusted with the duty of the Captain to assisted at the reduction of the Isle of France. After obtaining post rank he never had any further employment afloat, but was appointed to half-pay in 1816. He accepted flag rank in 1846, and was appointed Vice-Admiral in 1851, as Admiral in 1863.

REAR-ADMIRAL WILLIAM ALLEN.

Rear-Admiral William Allen, C.B., died at Greenwich, entered the service in October, 1803, as a first-class volunteer on board the Standard, and he had a long and distinguished career. He was present at Middelburg in the Standard he was present at the passage of the Dardanelles, in 1807, and in the following year he assisted in the capture of the Danish fleet at the bombardment in the Adriatic. He was afterwards in the Leda, and co-operated in the reduction of Java in 1811, and also took part in the destructive bombardment attack on the pirates settlement of Sambas, in Borneo, in 1813. Two years afterwards he became a Lieutenant, and in 1818 was appointed to the Superbe, in 1836, to the William and Mary yacht, and served in that vessel till he was appointed to the Victory, in 1838, and to the Excellent, in 1839. In 1841 the Wilberforce, sent in the disastrous expedition up the Niger, whence he returned towards the end of 1842. His post rank was obtained in the following year, and in 1846 he was made a Rear-Admiral on the retired list. He married the gallant Admiral died on the 23rd ult., in his seventy-second year, at his residence, Bank House, Greenwich.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Right Hon. Charles Compton Cavendish, Lord Chesham, was proved in London on the 23rd ult., the executors mentioned being the Earl of Lovelace, Lieutenant-Colonel Cavendish, and Viscount of Devonshire; and his son, now Baron Chesham. The personalty was sworn under £40,000. The husband of the testatrix was the fourth Lord Chesham, and married Catherine, daughter of the ninth Marquis of Huntly, K.T. His Lordship has one or two remarkable clauses in his will. Considering the impoverished Bucks from 1847 to 1857, for which county he was Deputy-Lieutenant, he directs that the sum of £1000 be paid to the trustees of his will in 1876, and to the same amount in 1883. A very liberal charge is made upon the family estates in Bucks and Lancashire for the maintenance of as well as a provision for a suitable settlement and bequests by the will. The residue of the personal property is left to his son, the present Lord.

The will of Sir Henry Martin, Bart., of Tunbridge Wells, was proved in London by the sole executrix and widow, Lady Martin, on the 19th ult., the personalty being sworn under £28,000. Sir Henry succeeded to the title in 1851 on the death of his father, Admiral Sir Thomas Byam Martin, G.C.B., the latter having been created a Baronet as far back as 1800. A very liberal charge is made upon the family estates in Bucks and Lancashire for the maintenance as well as a provision by marriage

No. 1245.—VOL. XLIV. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1864. TWO SHEETS, FIVEPENCE

THE OCCUPATION OF SCHLESWIG.

MILITARY events in the north of Europe have succeeded one another with breathless rapidity. The invasion of Denmark by the Austro-Prussian troops on the 1st of February was followed two days after by a collision of arms and shedding of blood. On the 3th inst. it became obvious that the Prussians would be able to cross the Schlei between Arnis and Cappeln, and thus to turn the left of the Danish position; and the Danes, bowing to necessity, evacuated the city of Schleswig, together with the whole defensive line of the Dannewerk, and retired in haste upon Flensburg, to save, if possible, their line of retreat. Whatever may be the character of later tidings, the military aspect of the quarrel will now yield in interest to the political. Schleswig is in the occupation of the two German Powers. What will they do with it?

The Cabinets of Berlin and Vienna have repeated their diplomatic assurances that they still abide by the London Treaty of 1852—in other words, that, in seizing upon and holding Schleswig as "a material guarantee," the object at which they aim is neither a violation of the territorial integrity of Denmark nor a setting aside of the succession which the Powers subscribing that treaty engaged to recognise. They still profess to be beyond the Eider for the purpose of compelling Denmark to make good the promises she made to Austria and Prussia in 1851, relative to the non-incorporation of the duchy of Schleswig with the kingdom of Denmark, and to the relief of its German-speaking inhabitants from administrative oppression. In forecasting the probabilities of their future course it would be puerile not to take into account the fact that, so far as these professed ends are concerned, the invasion of Schleswig had been previously rendered unnecessary. The two German Powers were informed, before a single soldier had passed the Eider, that England, France, and Russia would go hall for Denmark that she should do all that her engagements bound her to do, if sufficient time were allowed her to do it constitutionally. The offer was declined. For the satisfaction of excited Germany it was deemed necessary by Austria and Prussia that they should exact their terms at the sword's point. They preferred a material to a moral security. They have incurred considerable loss of life and treasure in obtaining it; and, seeing how superfluous was this sacrifice as a means of realising their avowed object, one is led to ask with increased anxiety, what they will do with it?

The military occupation of Schleswig having been resolved upon, it was better for the Danes that the forces sent into the field by Austria and Prussia should be too overwhelming to allow of any prolonged resistance. It was, from the first, a matter of moral, almost of mathematical, certainty that the most desperate courage and obstinacy on the part of the Danes could have no good influence upon the issue—that, however they might be counselled by the pride of patriotism, they were not demanded by national honour; that although they might have inflicted great damage on the invaders, they would inevitably entail a sad and needless waste of life upon the invaded; and it is now obvious that the appeal to arms having been quickly decided, the two German Powers will be without even a plausible pretext for expanding their demands. It goes against the feelings of all right-minded on-lookers to see the weak flung to the ground with irresistible violence by the strong; but where the disparity of strength is so great as to admit of no rational hope that the end will in any case be bettered by a protracted struggle, our very sympathies with the weak impel us to rejoice in the earliest possible termination of the unequal strife.

The swiftness of their triumph, however, will not have swept the path of the two Germanic Powers of political perplexities. The march of their soldiery has been too inefficiently resisted, and the roar of their artillery will have too soon died away to allow of their acting upon the presumption that their late professions can be honourably disregarded. They can hardly pretend that either of the two alternatives hinted at by M. von Bismarck as possible inducements for departing from the Treaty of 1852 have yet presented themselves, nor that good faith to their co-signatories has ceased to be the rule to the strict observance of its stipulations. But what will their own German subjects who desire to tear up that treaty as null and void for want of adequate authority have to say to an issue which not merely falls short of, but practically creates a fresh obstacle to, the fulfilment of their passionately cherished expectations? What will the minor Princes of the Confederation think of the quietly taking possession which has been given by a vote of the Diet by the two German Powers only to ensure a mortifying frustration of their own bolder policy? We shall see whether the victors who have stepped in as armed arbitrators between the obligations enforced by treaties and the exactions demanded by revolution, will have the will or the ability to accommodate the one or the other, and, having so far yielded to the pressure of the latter as to overstep the limits of international usage, whether they will stop short and redeem their own pledges in defiance of the intense ill-will of all Germany? Or, will the fiery millions of the German race, who, ever since 1848, have brooded over the Schleswig-Holstein question, be at last to be ceased to care for any solution of it but that of annexation, be likely to accept the cry of pecuniarum swung by military superiority from the Danes, in lieu of the more solid advantage for which they have made, as they conceive, such costly sacrifices, and which seems now to be within their grasp? We shall see.

The tone of the Imperial Parliament in response to the statements made to both Houses by her Majesty's Ministers warrants the inference that, should the issue of the war be kept within the line of policy marked out by their own reiterated assurances, England sees no sufficient reason for intervening. If, however, in compliance with the revolutionary force behind them, they decide, as the Austrian and Prussian Governments of Schleswig from Denmark to Germany, the public mind, already somewhat sore, may easily be goaded into a state of dangerous irritation. No doubt, the considerations which may be urged against our going to war on the present occasion are cogent. First, we should have to do so without a Continental ally. For France and Russia decline to stir in the matter. For Austria and Prussia to engage with Denmark and the season of the year would preclude our rendering her effectual assistance until after the annexation of Schleswig to the territories of the Confederation would have become a fait accompli. Secondly, we should be undertaking to wrresting back the duchy from Germany, it would only be to restore it to the rule of a race whom half the inhabitants of the province detest. And, lastly, we should be commencing a European war, to be conducted at a distance from us, on the slightest indication within view of what might be its extent, duration, or results. These reasons, enforced by the consideration that English interests are not concerned in the matter, will meet likely enough with a ready response from our readers themselves with protesting against so flagrant a violation of international morality, and, having done so, to leave the German Powers to the inevitable retribution which the future has in store for them.

The retreat of the Danish army to Alsen, however distasteful and mortifying to all classes at Copenhagen, seems to have been necessary, and to have been conducted with the best defensive works behind which the Danes fought proved, as many suspected it would, too extensive to be held long by so small an army against the overwhelming numbers sent into the field by Austria and Prussia. The Danish troops, on their retreat, there remained no feasible alternative to the Danish General but a hasty retreat through Flensburg to the adjacent Island. Here the discomfited Danes may still hold out for a while, but, as they are too few to defy for any lengthened period the power of their enemies, and have no prospect of assistance, we hope they will not occasion a further and fruitless waste of life in retaining it. They have done more than enough to vindicate their national honour, and the sympathies of Europe will be all the more freely accorded to them if, contenting themselves with that, they patiently accept a conclusion which no courage can avert, but which further resistance may aggravate.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE WAR IN DENMARK.

SEVERAL sketches have been received from our Special Artist in Denmark, one of which represents the entrance of the Austrian Archduke Albrecht—taken by him whilst at that town on his way to the seat of war, is engraved on the present page. It conveys an impression that the allied army is now taking possession of Schleswig to deliver it up to the Confederation, whereas, as we have already fully declared in Britain has, we learn, taken place since it was known that the town had ceased to be held by the Danes, and the allies as it was previously against them. In the afternoon of the 1st inst., whilst the celebrated regimental band of the Austrian Archduke "Kaiser Franz," which had just arrived from Berlin by special train and marched through Hamburg, arrived at the Holstein frontier and entered Altona by the "Nobis Gate" (so called from its bearing the inscription of the motto of the town, "Nobis bene, mensis male"). They were received by the assembled populace with loud cheering, and escorted by them through the festively decorated streets—every house displaying flags, banners, and wreaths—to the terminus, where they were treated with refreshments, at the expense of the town, previous to being forwarded by special trains to the front. In the course of the afternoon several other Prussian corps arrived, and were received in the same way with noisy demonstrations of joy.

TURKEY.

The Sultan has decreed that, dating from the commencement of the current year, a certain number of youths, fixed for the present at forty-two, and chosen each year from among the Greek, Bulgarian, Armenian, and Catholic Armenian communities, shall be educated at the Government expense in the Imperial Military Schools of Constantinople and Pera, with a view to their subsequently receiving commissions in the Turkish army. Eight of the number have been brought up for the civil service. These students will likewise be permitted to practise their religious and other usy restrictions, in the same manner as the Christian students in the Imperial School of Medicine; and, to prevent any undue influence being exercised over them by the Mussulman fellow-students, they are forbidden to embrace Mohammedanism under pain of expulsion.

AMERICA.

The Columbia brings news from New York to the evening of Jan. 28.

The most important fact mentioned is the near approach of General Longstreet, reinforced by 20,000 men, to Knoxville. Skirmishing between his cavalry and the federal cavalry under Sherman, is the latest accounts state that great anxiety, amounting to a panic, prevailed in the city.

The Confederates had made two separate attacks on Athens and Decatur, in Alabama, in both of which they are said to have failed, but the West several entire corps have re-enlisted.

The town of the Memphis is still occupied—indeed, almost suspended—by the Confederate batteries.

Mr. Lincoln has been nominated by the Republican members of the New Jersey Legislature for the presidency.

The delegates to the State Convention held at Little Rock, Arkansas, have passed a resolution prohibiting slavery.

In Congress the Senate has passed a measure providing members to take the oath. Senator Bryant took the oath, and announced his intention of retiring into private life. The Judiciary Committee in the Senate has discharged from consideration the resolution to expel Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, from the Senate. Senator Hale urges the appointment of a committee to investigate the charges in the War Department, and proved statistically that the United States were calling upon the people for less than the average number of men during former naval expenses of all the European Powers, excluding Denmark and Italy, and has been more than three times less than the naval force of England during the three years and five months of the Crimean War.

Mr. Fernando Wood has introduced a bill for the impeaching members in Congress the Senate has passed a resolution prohibiting slavery.

General Butler reports that he had sent three transports and a company to the city of Jane. Never, which he landed seven miles below Fort Powhatton and captured twenty Confederates, seven of whom belonged to the regular corps, and twenty-seven horses and waggons, besides destroying large stores.

Re-enlistments in the Federal army are very numerous. Throughout the West several entire corps have re-enlisted.

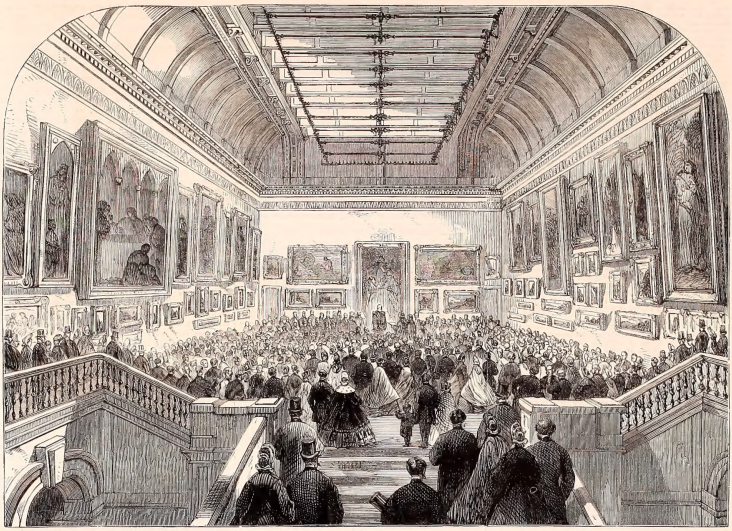
THE MARQUIS OF SLIGO.

LORD ABERCROMBY.

THE Most Hon. George John Browne, Marquis of Sligo, Earl of Altamont, Viscount Westport, and Baron Monteagle, in the Peerage of Ireland, and Baron Monteagle of Westport, in the county of Mayo, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom (by which latter title his Lordship sits in the House of Peers), is the third Marquis, the creation of that dignity having taken place in the year 1800. The Marquis was born Jan. 31, 1805, received the earlier part of his education at Eton, and succeeded, in 1845, to his hereditary titles on the death of his father, Howe-Peter the second Marquis, some time Governor of Jamaica. His Lordship's ancestors were first elevated to the Peerage in 1760, the creation being that of a Baron; this was followed by a viscountcy in 1768; an earldom in 1771; and the marquisate, as already stated, in 1800. The barony of the United Kingdom was conferred, in 1806, on Sir John Denis Browne, K.P., the first Marquis, and grandfather of the existing Peer. The present Marquis has been twice married—first, to Ellen Sydney, daughter of the sixth Viscount Strangford; and, secondly, to Julia Catherine Anne, daughter of Anthony Nugent, Esq., of Pallas, in the county of Galway, heir presumptive to the earldom of Westmeath; but both ladies are deceased. His Lordship has always been a consistent Liberal, and votes for the abolition of church rates. Although a regular attendant at the sittings of the House of Peers, the Marquis has hitherto not taken any active part in their Lordships' debates, and his moving the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne this Session may, in a manner, be taken to be his maiden speech.

LORD ABERCROMBY.



The seconder of the Address, George Ralph, Baron Abercromby, of Aboukir, and Tullibody, in the county of Clackmannan, in Scotland, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, is the fourth possessor of the Barony, which he derives from his great-grandmother, the wife of the gallant General, Sir Ralph Abercromby, who died of wounds received at the glorious victory of Alexandria, March 28, 1801. In order to mark the sense which the Sovereign and the country entertained of Sir Ralph's services, his widow was created a Peeress in her own right with remainder to her sons. Her Ladyship was succeeded, in 1821, by her eldest son, George, who married Montagu, third daughter of the first Viscount Melville, better known as Henry Dundas, the special and chosen colleague of William Pitt, under whom he held several offices, amongst them that of President of the Board of Control and First Lord of the Admiralty. George, Lord Abercromby's brother, the second son of the Baroness, was the Right Hon. James Abercromby, some time Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Scotland, who subsequently (in 1835) held the office of Master of the Mint, and was a member of Lord Melbourne's Cabinet, and, in 1835, was elected Speaker of the House of Commons, on his retirement from which he was created Baron Dunfermline. The present Peer is the eldest son of George Ralph, second Baron; he was born in 1838, and succeeded in 1852. In the same year he married Louisa Jane Caroline, fifth daughter of the then Viscount Duncan, now Earl of Camperdown, and a granddaughter of the famous Admiral Duncan, Lord Viscount Hitherto, as we believe, his Lordship has not appeared before the House of Lords in the character of a speaker, nor has he taken any prominent part in politics.

LORD HIGHNAM GROSVENOR.

The Right Hon. Richard de Aquila Grosvenor, the courtesy Lord Richard Grosvenor, is the youngest son of Richard, second and present Marquis of Westminster, by his wife, Lady Elizabeth Mary, daughter of George first Duke of Sutherland, and was born in 1837. His Lordship was educated at Westminster School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. Being a Liberal in politics, and professing to be an adherent of the Government of Lord Palmerston, he, on the death of Mr. Mayall, in May, 1861, was selected as a candidate for the representation of the county of Flint, and during his canvass received the general support of Mr. Gladstone, who, however, is not in accord with that part of Wales. His recorded opinions on politics state that, while advocating a liberal policy he is in favour of the continued union of Church and State, but will support any measure which will relieve Dissenters from church rates, failing which they will consent to vote for the total abolition of those rates. Being, in every sense of the term, a young member, his Lordship had addressed the constituency in the House until he was called upon, in pursuance of established practice, as connected with, and therefore in a measure responsible, sensing, the political aristocracy in the third estate of the realm, to move the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne on the present occasion.

MR. GÖSCHEN.

Few members of the House of Commons have taken a marked position in the House of Commons in that short period of a Session which elapses between May and August as George Joachim Göschen, Esq., who, on the death of Mr. Wentworth Wood, last year, was elected one of the representatives of the city of London in Parliament. He is now barely eighty-six weeks his two speeches last year; but they were sufficient to distinguish him as an able party and finance speaker, possessing a favourite pupil of Dr. Tait, the present Bishop of London, then Head Master of the school, and a pupil of the distinguished Dr. Hall, now subsequently a member of Oriel College, Oxford. Mr. Göschen is a merchant in London, and is the first of the Privileged Class who has taken the line of a work, entitled "The Theory of the Foreign Exchanges." In his political opinions he is to be classed, generally, as a Liberal, and in an advocate of a gradual extension of the suffrage, but is opposed to the abolition of church rates.

Our Portraits are from photographs taken by Messrs. John and Charles Watkins, of Parliament-street.

SEATING AT FLORENCE.

In Florence this year our English residents and visitors have been able to enjoy skating with as much zest as has been done on the ornamental waters in our metropolitan parks for the last two or the 20th ult. the thermometer was at 8 deg. (centigrade), and the Arno was almost completely frozen over. Such a cold season has not been known for by the Florentines for ten years; and it has been still more trying on account of a sharp easterly wind blowing for many days. As the Engraving on page 161 will show, the scene where the skating went on was outside Porta St. Gallo, near to the fortress; and our correspondent informs us that the ice was excellent in Florence, Mr. Spence, took great trouble to encourage the sport. He established a band near the banks of the canal and quadrilles were danced with much animation and grace. On the night of the 20th a torchlight fête was given by the Florentines, when many ladies distinguished themselves by the elegance of their movements.

It appears from a Parliamentary return issued on Thursday that £77,849 was last year paid out of the Consolidated Fund, for interest and sinking fund on account of the Russian Loan, guaranteed by England between Russia, Holland, and Great Britain. The sum still due of the original £9,000,000 loan guaranteed is £8,000,000 sterling.

Since the severe weather set in wild boars have appeared in great numbers in the forests of the Pyrenees, and have become very destructive. Hunting-clubs were, in consequence, organised at Bagnères, Bigan, Pouzac, and other places, and more than forty of these animals were killed. Wolves have likewise been seen, in numbers of three and five, in the centre of France. Several sheep have been carried off by them during the past few days, and a child killed and partly devoured.

IMMIGRATION INTO CANADA.—By a return of the chief emigration agent of Canada it appears that the number of persons who arrived in that province during the year by the River St. Lawrence was 18,706, of whom 6215 female adults, 4728 children between the ages of 1 and 12, and 941 infants. Of the latter 2,020 were from New England, 1,000 from Ireland, 1,000 from Scotland, and Prussians, and 1065 other foreigners. The male immigrants comprised 2188 farmers, 1,107 labourers, 2098 mechanics, 1,000 persons engaged in the public service, and 816 clerks and traders. Compared with the previous year there was a decrease of 1,000 in the number of immigrants. The reason assigned for the number of arrivals having been materially diminished is the return to their homes from the United States, who have become permanent residents in Western Canada. Desertions occurred during the year from regiments serving in the United States by offers of higher wages, returned to the colony and resumed their occupations which they had abandoned.

QUARRIES OF PARIS.—We extract the following curious details regarding the famous quarries on the left bank of the Seine, from Dictionnaire Général des Sciences, by MM. Privat-Deschanel and A. Focillon, a work the first volume of which has just appeared. Quarries of Paris are of two undergroud, and comprise four principal strata of limestone, forming a total thickness of about fifteen metres. The first, or uppermost, is a coarse chalk, which is stone of the best quality, hard and finely grained; it rests on a stratum of inferior quality, called roche. The third is a compact limestone, lying below the former in the same sort, consisting of argillaceous limestone, which is called liais, and is the most valuable of all. The fourth is a coarse limestone with beds of flint, which are used for macadamising roads. This stratum is called banc-vert, or millstone of geologists; it is rather soft, and is said in a rough-hewn state; the thickness of this stratum is about seven metres on an average. The last stratum is the Sous St. Jacques, a soft limestone, interspersed with shells, and used for common building purposes. The quarries are known as—1, bancs de broyer, or unskilled labourers, earning from 2f. to 4f. a day; 2, the bancs d'arbalet, who perform subterranean labour, such as excavating supports, &c., and earn 4f. a day; 3, the tourneurs, who cut vertical grooves, two metres in depth, into the stone, so as to insulate the masses, which are each 10 metres in length; these men earn 4f. 50c.; 4, the mouleurs, who, lying down, cut a horizontal groove on the stone, so as to separate it from its base. As they go on, they put supports under, which are afterwards removed, and the stone is left to fall. These men earn from 5f. to 6f. 50c. a day; 5, the tireurs, who, by means of a rope, a pulley, and a windlass, raise the stone to the surface; 6, the ouvrageurs, or fortmen, who direct the works, earn 5f. 50c. The average yield per annum of the quarries is 1,000,000 cubic metres, the extraction for which costs about 10,000,000f., and is sold for about 18,000,000f. In 1858 there were employed about 3,000 men, for which period, at the rate of that period, 1,800,000f. The catacombs of Paris are old quarries which have been abandoned.—Galignani.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1864.

We consider ourselves fortunate in being but rarely compelled to address the public upon matters affecting the interests of this Journal, or in defence of any portion of its conduct; but some expressions which were used by Mr. Layard in the debate on Monday night in the House of Commons, on the burning of Kegoisma, demand a few words from the conductors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. In Mr. Buxton's speech in support of his resolution condemnatory of the destruction of the city, he publicly mentioned that Maidstone read an extract from an article accompanying a sketch of the bombardment of that city transmitted to us by our Special Artist in Japan. The object of the reference made by the honourable gentleman to the great amount of ruin that had been effected by the British squadron. In his reply, on behalf of the Government, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs "did not wish to say anything against the circulation and useful publication the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS; but those who were in the secret knew how drawings were made of places at the other end of the world, and he could not consider any person connected with the NEWS was at Kagosima when the engagement took place. It was not impossible, indeed, that a picture of a town in South America had been furbished up to represent a town in Japan."

Whatever pictorial value may attach to the Engravings of distant scenery and events which appear in this Journal, their greatest value is, undoubtedly, in their genuineness and authenticity. To give this ample assurance they are well served by the gentlemen who undertake the troublesome, and often dangerous, mission of sketching for us. Remarks, therefore, like those which escaped Mr. Layard in the heat of a debate, would scarcely be considered complimentary if they proceeded from a less distinguished man than the accomplished Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. We felt it due to him, no less than to ourselves, to convince him that the evidence brought forward by Mr. Buxton from our pages was of its highest order, and we had the satisfaction of showing Mr. Layard, not only the original sketch, transmitted by Mr. Charles Wirgman, our Artist in Japan, but some evidence in unintended but complete corroboration of the accuracy of Mr. Wirgman's drawing. Mr. Layard's frankness and courtesy are proverbial, and we have no reason to doubt that he will be glad, upon fitting occasion, to do us the justice which we have denied until the excitement of an energetic debate. We also thought it our duty to place the sketches and papers in the hands of the honourable member for Maidstone, that he might be satisfied of the truthfulness of the extract he had quoted from this journal.

Whilst adverting to the subject, it seems scarcely out of place to mention, lest any similar misconception should arise in regard to other Engravings which are just now sought after with the utmost interest, that in Schleswig-Holstein Mr. Lonsdale is present on the scene of the strife there raging, entirely engaged with his pencil and pen in our service; and that Mr. F. Vizetelly is in Richmond, as we learned not an hour ago from one of high authority just returned to England from the Southern States via the "underground." Sketches from the latter gentleman have to make their way through the blockade, and such as escape the hands of the Federals appear at once in this Paper. To this system of procuring, under great risks and at almost any cost, faithful representations of the scenes we propose to depict, is due the greater part of the favour by which the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is received by the public.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has never had occasion to deliver sentence in a case of more importance than that in which judgment was given on Monday last. We shall avoid entering into the slightest controversial argument upon the solemn questions connected with the investigation, for we feel that, while it is impossible to avoid special reference to a topic of so much public interest, the limits to which the journalist is restricted render it impossible to discuss such a theme in the only way in which justice could be done to it. We do not repeat the hackphrase that the subject is unsuited to the columns of a newspaper; for there are very few subjects which can be so regarded; and, moreover, there are many considerations connected with this very case which are most fittingly dealt with in a journal; but, inasmuch as we could treat the matter but briefly, and therefore unsatisfactorily, we shall best discharge our duty by simply reporting the result of the appeal by two of the authors of "Essays and Reviews."

It will be remembered by the thousands who take a deep and becoming interest in the subject, that the Court of Arches was called upon by the Bishop of Salisbury to deal with certain charges made against Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson, and that the majority of these charges were rejected by Dr. Lushington, but that he decided unfavourably to the accused clergymen, and suspended both for one year. Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson appealed to the Judicial Committee, and its sentence was given on Monday. We should mention that two assessors, who, in a strictly judicial character, were withdrawn from the case; and it need only be stated that one of these alleged that Dr. Williams was unsound on the doctrine of propitiation, and that the other alleged that Mr. Wilson was unsound on the difference between natural and unconvenanted mercies—questions of which the theologian will at once appreciate the real as well as the technical value, but which did not come under the consideration of the Court.

The accusation against Dr. Williams was based on his "Review of Baron Bunsen," and resolved itself into the charges that he put forth views as to the inspiration of the Bible which are contrary to the teaching of the Church of England in the Articles, and that he denied the orthodox doctrine of justification by faith. The charges against Mr. Wilson were based on his article entitled "Séances Historiques de Genève," and were to the effect that he denied that the Bible was written under inspiration, and affirmed that portions of it were not revelation, and that he denied that the punishments in the future world would be eternal.

The Chancellor, Lord Westbury, Sir John Patteson, and in the presence of the Bishop of London and Lords Kingsdown, Cranworth, and Chelmsford, delivered judgment at some length. He stated that the tribunal whose sentence he was giving did not pronounce any decision as to the effect that "Essays," but only upon the extracts laid before the Council. The first charge against Dr. Williams was not borne out by the evidence, nor was the second. The third charge referred to the unsoundness of certain of the terms in which Dr. Williams had referred to the subject. In regard to Mr. Wilson's case and to the first charge against him, the Chancellor declared that he was unable to put down that the Bible is entirely a work of inspiration, or taken what is known as the "plenary" view of the Scriptures, and therefore that a clergyman of the Church of England was not liable to penalties for advocating the doctrine which Mr. Wilson had adopted. The second charge was not held to be proved, inasmuch as Mr. Wilson had only given expression to his hope that it might be consistent with the justice of God that no man should perish eternally; and the Council had not been able to find anything in the articles, the creeds, or the formularies which made it penal in a clergyman to give utterance to the hope of the final redemption and pardon of all human creatures.

The judgment of the Dean of the Court of Arches was, therefore, reversed; the suspension of the two clergymen (which, however, had long since expired) was set aside by it; and the Bishop of Salisbury was condemned in the costs of the appeal, but not in those of the Arches Court. The Archbishops of Canterbury and York dissented with the rest of the Council on one point—that referring to the inspiration of the Bible.

So ends the long-pending prosecution of the authors of two of the articles in the "Essays and Reviews," a book of which little is now heard, and which probably will be remembered only by reason of the measures taken to punish Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson. Some of the teaching of that book has been so completely eclipsed by the later and far bolder non-orthodoxy of a higher dignitary of the Church, that attention has been withdrawn from it, and careful suggestions ed doubting clergymen to the outspoken and deliberate affirmations of a Bishop. But the sentence of the Judicial Committee will recall the theological student to the pages of the "Essays and Reviews," and it is reasonable to believe that, although the law has done all that it can do and said all that it can say in the matter, the theological world will scarcely be content to leave matters where they are. For, without reacquisitating details, it will be seen that the Judicial Committee has taken what will be considered by thousands of religious people as a most strict view of clerical obligation. We have, however, fulfilled our work of record, and conclude with the earnest hope that all these debates may tend to promote the interests of truth and of true religion.

In a few copies of our early Impression last week an announcement was made to the effect that the Queen would not receive the visit of Princess Dagmar this season. This is not the fact. The brevity of the Princess's visit will hold all the Courts, as last year, it being the opinion of the Queen's physicians that a visit of any length would be inconsequent on her recuperative powers.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

THE CONFEDERATE RAMS AT LIVERPOOL.—EARL DERBY again asked the noble Earl (Earl Russell) a question that he had asked on Tuesday with reference to the Confederate rams now lying in the Mersey. The noble Earl had stated that he could not lay any papers upon the table of the House with reference to the rams, as the question had been taken into the courts of law. He understood that that had been since the noble Earl spoke last, and that from that time until this no step has been taken to bring the cause to an issue, except that on Saturday last the application was filed. He asked the noble Earl humbly conceived might have been done in the course of October or November. The question was one of great importance. He prepared to lay upon the table the correspondence which had taken place upon the representations which had been made by the injuries sustained by American commerce in consequence of certain vessels being allowed to leave British ports. He wished for the correspondence as well as that relating to the Alabama, and any correspondence that had taken place between the Law Officers of the Crown and the Foreign Affairs department with reference to the question. He understood that the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) was about to leave office, and he hoped that her Majesty's Government would not be allowed to escape responsibility in the matter by their retirement from office. He hoped that the noble Earl would be able to give some information on the subject.

EARL GRANVILLE moved that the papers relating to the Alabama should be laid before the House of Commons.

EARL RUSSELL said that he thought the noble Earl was fair enough to agree with him that the question of the Alabama was one that could not be separated from that of the Confederate rams now lying in the Mersey. He thought that the noble Earl had stated that he could not lay any papers upon the table of the House with reference to the rams, as the question had been taken into the courts of law. He understood that that had been since the noble Earl spoke last, and that from that time until this no step has been taken to bring the cause to an issue, except that on Saturday last the application was filed. He thought

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE forces seem to have thought better of it in the Lord Eglinton's hunt, which was the scene of a severe "fox famine" before Christmas, as four capital days came in succession; and then, after a week's interval, they had the finest run that has, perhaps, ever been seen in Ayrshire over fifteen miles of a rare country. Seven foxes were killed in the five days. It is stated by The Life that Lord Henry Bentinck (who had a splendid thing on Jan. 29) intends to give up the Burton hounds. The West Norfolk and the Suffolk would like to hear of a master, and so would the Cumberland. The latter pack hunts twice, and occasionally three times a week in a quiet way, has plenty of foxes, and a subscription list of over £1,000 a year. The answer to some one who asked lately whether Charles Payne was all right again after breaking his collar-bone, ran thus—"I should say so, for I saw him myself jump a gate on the swing."

The hottest weight for the Liverpool Steeplechase Handicap is 10st., or just 14lb. more than it was last year; and the best comparison on the efficacy of the heavy-weight system is that sixty-one horses are eligible as we have mentioned, and that Mr. Ten Broeck's winner of last year), heads the list; and Umpire, 12st. 7lb., from the same stable, stands second. Alcibiade (12st. 4lb., 1st in 1862, and 1861), also stands in, and so does old Bridegroom, 11st. 8 lbs. The City and Suburban Handicap has a similar complexion, though the three-year-olds (the Great Metropolitan retains half its eighty-two as "Convicts"), those veterans Alcibiade and Bridegroom, and the acceptances for the Newmarket Handicap; and Fairwater, 9st. 11lb., exercise the same position for the Metropolitan Steeplechase, which also was last year.

The course brought off the important meetings between the frosts, but neither of them had much influence upon the Waterloo Cup betting. At the South Lancashire meeting Grisette and Gentleman, both by Gemmaker, ran, so far well on form for the Waterloo, but Grisette at the Ridgway Mr. Campbell suffered heavily, and three of his kennel went down in the first two rounds. Of course, the Lord Cocrorem, who had pleased his owner at home, won two courses, Mercvale by Cain, and Jezabel by Bedford, in the Open Stakes, and South Lancashire Puppy Stakes; and the blood of another sire, Judge, produced a Clifton Cup winner in Judge Not, while Saffron went to the fore with Streamer in the Members' Plate. Spithorne Park was a great meeting, but the Cup for which it was not quite in her best form for the Netherby Cup. Mr. Thompson will most probably stand on Tullamore, Judge Not, and Saffron. Thrush up to the mark in case of accidents. Sea Foam will, it is said, try once more for Mr. Mytchett's cup at the Newmarket Meeting; the Messrs. Campbell are pretty certain to depend on Cadamore and Calabresco; and, according to The Field, Patient has got a sponsor in Mr. Lloyd, and Lord Clanricarde has entered a Sparkle in his own name. After the defeat of his kennel at Kyrlaw, it is rather thought that Mr. Lloyd will retire in his friend's dog and not on one of his own, although he is known to have an eye to Lord Tracy for Coronet, who has won a Cup and a Plate already.

At the monthly meeting of the Acclimatisation Society eight new members, including the Archdeacon of Dublin, were elected, and Mr. Lowe was enabled to "report progress" in the matter of the application which has been received from all parts through the Foreign and Colonial Office. Mr. Wenga Pigeon's letter was read, and he said there, like "the sheep" of Little Bopeep, had left its tail behind it, from which the meeting argued that it must have been difficult to exclude. Mr. Boxall stated that he had received numerous presents of rocks and collections for New Zealand; and Mr. Tegetmeier exhibited his newly illustrated copy of Columella, which was handed up the wings, so as to prevent birds from injuring their plumage in confinement.

The Victoria, from Liverpool to Calcutta, has foundered at sea. Her crew took to the boats and were picked up and safely reached the west coast of Ireland on Saturday last, after having been tossed about for six days in the Atlantic. Two had died from cold and exposure. The other boat, manned by the captain and thirteen of the crew, arrived on the following Monday with only two survivors.

In every 100 of the 1,052 unions or single parishes in England and Wales. In the return of "No," signifying that nothing has been done, the remark in some cases is added, "Board of Guardians petitioned."

The total quantity of indigo imported into the United Kingdom in the year 1863 was 4,000,000 lbs., whereof 1,000,000 were contributed by British India, 1872 cwt. by France, 949 cwt. by Egypt, 264 cwt. by the French possessions in India, 4,000 lbs. by Java, 1,000 lbs. by Manilla, 56 cwt. by Mexico, 4750 cwt. by Central America, 4291 cwt. by New Granada, and 1107 cwt. by all other countries. Of the quantity entered for home use, brought in British ships, the total computed value having amounted to £2,845,954. Compared with the preceding year, 1863 showed a decrease, year a diminution in exports of 13,000 cwt. So large a falling-off led to a corresponding increase in value. The price, taking the average of 1863, was 5s. 4d. to £1 2s. 7d. per cwt., advanced in 1862 from £16 10s. 11d. to £20 3s. 5d. per cwt. A large augmentation has been made in the duties on indigo since 1853. but the exact amount cannot be given for the entire year until the December returns are published. The duty on the 1,000,000 lbs. entered for consumption in 1863 was £1,000, or 1d. per lb.

FRESCO-PAINTING.—At the meeting of the Society of Arts on Wednesday evening—Lord Hobn, M.P., in the chair—a paper was read by Mr. Gambier Parry, "On the Revival of Fresco-Painting in England." Mr. Gambier Parry observed, in the outset, that the revival of fresco-painting in this country, recently years ago, in favour of the adoption of frescopainting as a means of decorating the houses of Parliament. The experimentation had been carried out, but the trial had not hitherto been a successful one, though in the case of Maclise's portrait of Wellington the conditions of art might not to be considered as final. He then proceeded to describe briefly the process of fresco employed by Maclise, and the failure which in using simple pigments. One of the noble qualities of fresco-pictures was that, being on walls, they were immoveable. Another was that they were painted on real property, giving a dignity and opulence to the princely residences of the country. The author then referred to the conditions which form the framework, should be found necessary, upon and in proportion, and embodying great and noble subjects, and not merely decorative being admitted. Having thus briefly referred to the practice of this art ought, in his opinion, to be regulated, the author proceeded to describe in detail the steps that had been taken for the revival of the Fine-Art Commission, to introduce fresco in the decoration of the Palace of Westminster, and the difficulties which had arisen in carrying out fresco that have suffered decay, dwelling strongly upon the point that this was in all cases partial, never extending to the destruction of the work. Maclise was appointed, in 1847, to inquire into the condition of these works, and in 1858 he made his report. The author then described the nature of the chief difficulties, which, however, had been that the oil fresco process had been for the present abandoned, and that known under the name of water-glass substituted in its stead. Mr. Atkinson expressed his deep regret at the hasty conclusion. He thought that greater experience would lead to the overcoming of the difficulties that now hindered the full development of this noble art. The most practical answer to the objection that our climate and the atmosphere of populous cities were injurious to frescoes was, that at present there were in the metropolis several pictures, such as those in the Temple Church, which were perfectly uninjured, although painted in the fourteenth century. He further recommended that further inquiries should be made by a joint committee of members of Parliament and artists, in order that the matter might be put to the present state of knowledge on the subject, and the best means of permanent fresco-painting from injuring their plumage in confinement. THE SUN'S PARALLAX, as deduced by M. Hansen in connection with the theory of the moon, has been examined by M. Bulmer, of the Paris Academy. He ends his paper by saying that as recent determinations have given the distance of the sun as less one thirtieth, and its parallax as so much greater, we must conclude that the moon is less one tenth than that which corresponds to the parallax 8".5776, which has been hitherto adopted in the observation of the transit of Venus.

CONSTITUTION OF MATTER.—Some speculative ideas by Mr. Graham, the Master of the Mint, appear in the new number of the Philosophical Magazine. He says:—"The ultimate particles of matter is deprived of numerous and varying properties with which it appears invested when in the form of a liquid or solid. The gas exhibits to us matter in its simplest condition. There, again, may also be dependent upon atomic and molecular mobility, which, however, is not to be confounded with the mobility of masses. And further, that matter is divisible into ultimate atoms, uniform in size and weight. We may, therefore, conceive of a gas consisting of a single atom, and this, the ultimate particle of matter, may be supposed to have figure and to possess more or less motion, due, it must be assumed, to a primordial impulse. The mobility of the atom, and the number of its collisions, must be the greater the space occupied by the atom, somewhat as the orbit of a planet is more elliptic as the mean distance increases. The law of the diffusion of gas only in long tubes or denser matter. The specific motion of an atom being uniformly impressed, the diffusion of gases will be inversely as the square root of matter with an individual existence, and constitutes it a distinct substance or element."

ARTIFICIAL MARBLE.—In the new number of the Journal de Pharmacie et de Chimie there is a paper by M. Lassaigne, on "Marble on the Fusion of Carbonate of Lime and the Production of Marble." In conclusion, after stating that the production of artificial marble presents many difficulties, though its not be easy to find a material which, when exposed to a high temperature, will not undergo any change, he says that the material must itself be viewed as composed of a group or system of the same quantized interior atoms, following as a unit, but similar to those which regulate the constitution of the crystal. He then refers to experiments of that he results of Mr. Graham's interesting speculations, merely adding another exposition of his hypothesis:—"As in a liquid, the molecules, by virtue of the repulsive hypothesis of cavorious and undulation, as in molecular mobility the motion may be assumed to be the same. Each either is supposed to move in a full medium cut-de undulatio. A special rate of vibration, or pulsation, originally impressed on the atom, will find uniform relations that portion of matter with an individual existence, and constitutes it a distinct substance or element."

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Feb. 8).—Only a limited supply of English wheat was on sale in today's market. REFUGE FOR THE AGED AT AUTEUIL, NEAR PARIS.

THE relief of distress in France, where no general poor-law system exists, devolves in each department upon the Administration of Public Assistance, which derives its revenues from legacies, from contributions, and from property obtained at different periods from the State, or by other means. A large proportion of the funds of these administrations is devoted to the support of refuges for the aged and infirm, into most of which admission is gratuitous. A certain number, however, of these establishments are only partially supported by the Assistance Publique, and are set apart for the reception of persons formerly connected with professional or commercial pursuits, but whose circumstances, having become straitened, place them in a position little removed from poverty.

In the language of the official report of the Assistance Publique, recently published, the Refuge for the Aged at Auteuil is "an asylum where misfortune meets at the same time with assistance and consideration—where the hand of benevolence offers not only to succour but to raise." The institution of St. Périne, as it is called, is to some extent supported by the annual payments of the pensionnaires, and its inmates are therefore spared that feeling of humiliation which must, to every delicate mind, accompany an entire dependence upon public charity.

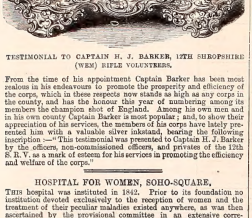
The original establishment of Saint Périne, formerly at Chaillot, was founded on a system expected to be self-supporting; but, although the prices of all articles of consumption in France were considerably lower sixty years ago than at present, the institution fell into a state of pecuniary embarrassment, from which it was relieved, in 1807, by a Government decree, which placed it under the direction of the Assistance Publique. The price of admission has varied at different periods, increasing with the gradual advance in the cost of articles of first necessity. At present each inmate pays annually the sum of 700f., and 100f. for the trousseau, receiving in return an amount of ease and comfort which five times that outlay could certainly not otherwise procure. A tariff also exists, according to which one single payment may be made, varying in amount with the time of life of the individual, who must be sixty years of age at least. The cost of each inmate of the Refuge to the Assistance Publique is 1200f. (about £50), which leaves a deficit of 460f. per head to be defrayed by the administration.

The institution at Auteuil has apartments for 256 pensionnaires, comprising therein the thirty-six beds of the infirmary, which is a perfect model of cleanliness and comfort. Each apartment is composed of a chamber, an antichamber, and a cabinet. There are, moreover, fourteen lodgings for married couples provided with an extra room. The pensionnaires enjoy entire liberty, the establishment being open from six in the morning till eleven at night. They take their meals in a beautiful refectory, ten persons at each table; the spoons and forks are of silver and the glasses and "decanters," rarely met with in France, are of crystal. In some cases the pensionnaires take their meals in their own rooms; but this privilege is acquired at their own expense.

The new buildings at Auteuil were opened on June 12, 1862. All the appliances of science were brought to bear in their construction, the arrangements for the diffusion of light, heat, and air being perfect. The entire property occupies a superficies of 78,614 square metres, the greater part of which has been laid out as a park, under the direction of the intelligent director. The establishment is well worthy of a visit from all who desire to study the question of co-operation on a grand scale, which is here perfectly solved, as, for £50 a year, board, washing, lodging, and medical attendance are provided in a style to which few really independent persons can pretend.

The subjects of our Engraving of St. Périne (from a sketch by M. Felix Thorigny) comprise a general view of the Court of Honour, and vignettes representing the villa of the director of the establishment, the laundry, and the culinary department.

The establishment, as seen from the Court of Honour, presents almost a palatial appearance. The women's habitations are on the right hand, the a palatial appearance. The women's habitations are on the right hand, the a man's on the left. Each block of building, or pavilion, is distinguished by a letter, except that in the centre of our principal Illustration, the Pavilion Joséphine, so named in honour of the wife of Napoleon I., who took great interest in this institution, and extricated it from difficulty at a time when, through erroneous calculations as to longevity, its existence was threatened. The Pavilion Joséphine contains a very pretty chapel for public worship; three saloons, magnificently furnished, for common resort in the evening or at other times; a library, well supplied with books and newspapers; and a dispensary.



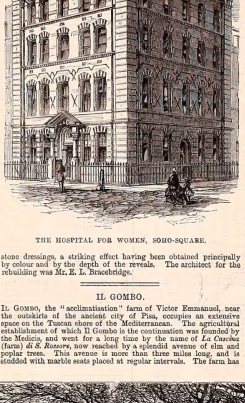
The dwelling of the director is a neat little villa, fitted up with comfort; the laundry is provided with every appliance for economising the time and ensuring the health of its ever-busy occupants; and the culinary department, under the care of men cooks, possesses a batterie de cuisine in copper worthy of a Prince's establishment, the cost of which exceeded a thousand pounds.

PRESENTATION TO LIEUT.-COLONEL HAMILTON, OF HILSTON.

On the 10th ult. an interesting gathering took place at Liverpool, on the occasion of the presentation of a testimonial to Colonel Hamilton by the non-commissioned officers and gunners of the 7th Lancashire Artillery Volunteers. The testimonial is a handsome massive silver vase, on an ebony stand, ornamented with wreaths of gold, and bearing the following inscription :—" Presented to Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton by the non-commissioned officers and gunners of the 7th L. A. V., as an expression of their personal regard and grateful admiration of his unvarying liberality and untiring courtesy and energy as their commanding officer. Liverpool, 1863." The piece of plate is valued at upwards of 250 guineas, and is the workmanship of Mr. C. F. Hancock, of Bond-street.

TESTIMONIAL TO CAPTAIN BARKER.

ABOUT four years and a half ago the foundation of the 18th Shropshire (Wem) Rifle Volunteer Corps was laid ; but at that time only a sufficient number of members could be found patriotic enough to form a subdivision, and in all probability this small number would have dwindled to nothing had not the present Captain (H. J. Barker, Esq.), about three years ago, consented to take command of it.



TESTIMONIAL TO CAPTAIN H. J. BARKER, 12TH SHROPSHIRE (WEM) RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.

From the time of his appointment Captain Barker has been most zealous in his endeavours to promote the prosperity and efficiency of the corps, which in these respects now stands as high as any corps in the county, and has the honour this year of numbering among its members the champion shot of England. Among his own men and in his own county Captain Barker is most popular ; and, to show their appreciation of his services, the members of his corps have lately presented him with a valuable silver inkstand, bearing the following inscription :—" This testimonial was presented to Captain H. J. Barker by the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the 12th S. R. V., as a mark of esteem for his services in promoting the efficiency and welfare of the corps."

HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN, SOHO-SQUARE.

THIS hospital was instituted in 1842. Prior to its foundation no institution devoted exclusively to the reception of women and the treatment of their peculiar maladies existed anywhere, as was then ascertained by the provisional committee in an extensive correspondence with the heads of the profession in this and other countries. Last year the committee determined to enlarge the building, which has been done at a cost to the institution of £2600. Heretofore there was only accommodation for twenty-five in-patients ; now the wards receive fifty. The yearly average of in-patients has been 135, and the attendance of out-patients 14,608. With the commencement of the present year the hospital was reopened. The proceedings commenced with prayer offered by the Rev. Edward Auriol ; after which addresses were given in the various wards by Lord Radstock, the Hon. Somerset R. Maxwell, the Rev. E. Auriol, the Rev. C. C. Layard, the Rev. J. Bloomfield, Captain Trotter, Colonel Bell, Dr. Protheroe Smith, W. Hill, Esq., and others, to a numerous and influential assemblage. The hospital is open for inspection to all who are interested in the prosperity of such a charity. The elevation next Soho-square and Frith-street is in coloured brick with Portland-stone dressings, a striking effect having been obtained principally by colour and by the depth of the reveals. The architect for the rebuilding was Mr. E. L. Blackbridge.

IL GOMBO.

IL GOMBO, the "acclimatisation" farm of Victor Emmanuel, near the outskirts of the ancient city of Pisa, occupies an extensive space on the Tuscan shore of the Mediterranean. The agricultural establishment of which Il Gombo is the continuation was founded by the Medicis, and went for a long time by the name of La Cascina (farm) di S. Rossore, now reached by a splendid avenue of elm and poplar trees. This avenue is more than three miles long, and is studded with marble seats placed at regular intervals. The farm has always been doubly interesting from the circumstance of its having been established on a shore abandoned by the sea. The ground is for the most part flat, and in the verdant Pisan meadows more than two thousand will cows feed at liberty ; they afford but little milk, and are kept particularly for the production of calves and as a source of veal supply for the population of Pisa. A vast number of horses are also bred at the "cascina." last year they exceeded fifteen hundred. But the greatest curiosity of this important farm is the herd of upwards of two hundred camels. About thirty of these animals are employed in the labours of the farm, and are lodged in the stables ; but the remainder wander in perfect freedom in the midst of the pine forests and along the sands which border the seashore.

The rescuers of Il Gombo have recently been devoted to acclimatisation purposes by the King of Italy, who, in spite of the onerous nature of his political occupations, devotes much of his leisure to the advancement of agricultural and other projects calculated to improve the condition of his subjects. Although comparatively in its infancy, the Royal acclimatisation farm is already rich in the possession of useful animals, many of the best specimens having been offered to his Majesty by the acclimatisation societies of England and France. The climate of the Pisan district is very favourable to the health and propagation of the animals imported, and the mildness of its winter and the ordinary tranquillity of the atmosphere are advantages which other establishments in Europe of a similar nature do not possess. For many ages the air of the shores of Tuscany has been recommended for persons suffering from disease of the lungs, and the sea-bathing establishment in the neighbourhood of Pisa has been much frequented by consumptive patients from England, who will now find an additional amusement in rambling in the farms Acclimatation of his Majesty Victor Emmanuel.

Our View of Il Gombo is from a sketch by M. Mariani, who, during his late voyage in Italy, enjoyed the advantage of visiting in detail this interesting "acclimatisation farm."

IL GOMBO, NEAR PISA, THE ACCLIMATISATION FARM OF HIS MAJESTY VICTOR EMMANUEL.

THE PACIFIC STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY'S NEW IRON MAIL STEAM-SHIP QUITO.

THIS beautiful vessel, which left the Mersey on the 27th ult., with mails and passengers for St. Vincent (de Verde) and Monte Video, en route to her station in the South Pacific, measures 271 ft. in length, 36 ft. extreme beam, 20 ft. depth, and 1400 tons builders' measurement. She was built by Messrs. Randolph, Elder, and Coy, at Govan, near Glasgow, from designs by Mr. Thomas Smith, naval architect to that firm, and is fitted with engines of 400 nominal, and 1400 indicated, horse power; which are the twelfth pair constructed for the company by that firm on their patent double-cylinder principle. The Quito is fitted with every appliance for the comfort of passengers in warm latitudes and the efficiency of the mail service which has been suggested by the company's experience since 1840 in the Pacific waters. On her trial at Liverpool, a few days before her departure, she attained a mean speed of 13½ knots on the extremely low consumption of 27 cwt. of Scotch coal per hour, with 23 lb. pressure of steam, and 24 revolutions of her engines. She will be a valuable addition to the company's steam fleet, which, commencing with three small vessels, now numbers seventeen first-class steamships, and which will be further strengthened by the Payta, 1800 tons, from the same yard, in July.

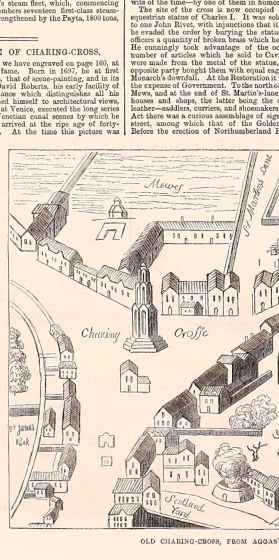
CANALETTO is seen, in the picture we have engraved on page 160, at the zenith of his powers and his fame. Born in 1697, he at first followed his father's branch of art, that of scene-painting, and in its practice acquired, like our own David Roberts, his early facility of handling, and the bold vraisemblance which distinguishes all his works. He soon, however, confined himself to architectural views, and, first at Rome and afterwards at Venice, executed the long series of pictures of Roman ruins and Venetian canal scenes by which he is so well known. Canaletto had arrived at the ripe age of forty-nine when he came to England, painted the portrait of Northumberland House, the street facade of which forms the principal object of the view before us (and which is so interesting from its identity with the structure that we are all so familiar with), was Algernon Sidney, Baron Percy, created a year or two later, in 1749, and, after the temporary extinction of the earldom, Earl of Northumberland. This nobleman appears to have been one of Canaletto's principal patrons during the artist's two years residence in this country. In last year's Exhibition of Old Masters at the British Institution there was, besides the present work and a still more effective picture of Whitehall, a view of the Duke's country seat, Alnwick Castle. The picture, engraved like other works by this prince of architectural painters, has a kind of documentary as well as art value. No painter carries an impression of fidelity and closeness of portraiture more forcibly than Canaletto; and, except a remarkable picture of the Bucito, in which he substituted a design by Palladio instead of the actual scene, his works have an exactness of imitation that almost rivals photography. This exact truth is known to have been secured by the use of the camera lucida; and Lanti tells us he was the first to apply to its proper use the linear perspective map. Aerial effects he commonly painted from nature. Of his mastery of aerial as well as of linear perspective; of his frequently fine colour and his unfailing effectiveness of light and shade, it is needless to speak. We may, however, remind the reader that Canaletto's nephew and pupil, Bernardo Bellotto, painted many pictures which pass by his uncle's name, and can scarcely be distinguished from them; and that there are many spurious imitations of his style by inferior artists. Canaletto's picture of Charing-cross is in the possession of the Duke of Northumberland.



Charing-cross, the large area at the meeting of the Strand, Whitehall, and Cockspur-street, with Trafalgar-square on the north, received the latter part of its name from the stone cross erected there (1291-94) to Eleanor, Queen of Edward I.; and was the last resting-place of her remains on the way from Northampton to their final repository in Westminster Abbey. The etymology of Charing remains unaccounted for. The fanciful notion that it owes its name to the circumstance above related, being derived from chere Reine, is manifestly erroneous from the fact that the place, then a small village quite apart from London, is entered under the name of Charing in "Doomsday Book." The cross was destroyed by puritanical bigotry, being ordered to be razed by order of the Long Parliament as a relic of Papistry. Its demolition, in 1647, was celebrated by some of the wits of the time—by one of them in humorous strains.

The site of the cross is now occupied by Hubert le Scrur's fine equestrian statue of Charles I. It was sold by order of Parliament to one John River, with injunctions that it should be broken up; but he evaded the order by burying the statue entire and showing the officers a quantity of broken brass which he alleged to be the remains. He cunningly took advantage of the occasion to manufacture a number of articles which he sold to Cavaliers, averring that they were made from the metal of the statue, as loyal relics; and the opposite party bought them with equal eagerness as trophies of the Monarch's downfall. At the Restoration it was produced and set up at the expense of Government. To the north of the statue were the King's Mews, and at the end of St. Martin's-lane a number of picturesque houses and shops, the latter being the quarter of the workers in leather—saddlers, curriers, and shoemakers. Previous to the Paving Act there was a curious assemblage of signs projecting far into the street, among which that of the Golden Cross was conspicuous. Before the erection of Northumberland House its site was occupied by the Chapel of St. Mary of Rounceval, a cell to the Priory of Roncesvaux, in Navarre. Henry VIII., on the Suppression, granted the site to Sir Thomas Caverden. It was afterwards transferred to Henry Howard, Earl of Northampton, who, in the reign of James I., built here a house, then called Northampton House, which was inherited by his kinsman the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Treasurer. By the marriage of Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland, with Elizabeth, daughter of the Earl of Suffolk, it passed to the house of Percy, and has continued to be the London residence of that noble family. The house was built by Bernard Janzen, an architect of repute in the reign of James I. Some alteration was subsequently made by Gerard Christmas. Northumberland House contains some fine pictures.

Charing-cross is rich in associations, both grave and gay. It was a favourite place for the display of the humours of Mr. Punch, or Punchinello, as that comic and restless Don Giovanni is termed in sundry entries in the overseers' books of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, dated 1666, March 29. "I talked," says Boswell, "of the chancellorss of Fleet-street, owing to the quick succession of people which we perceive passing through it." Johnson—"Why, Sir, Fleet-street has a very animated appearance, but I think the full tide of human existence is at Charing-cross." ("Boswell," Croker's ed., p. 433). It was at the Rummer Tavern, Charing-cross, that Matthew Prior was brought up by his uncle, the landlord, who had him educated at Westminster School. The Swan, at Charing-cross, was a favourite tavern of Ben Jonson. Like a beacatomb at the feet of the ill-fated Charles, the regicides were offered up hard by his statue. Proclamations were read here, hence the allusion in Swift,

Where all that passed, later no,
May be proclaimed at Charing-cross,

Edmund Curll, the notorious bookseller, stood here in the pillory. Sir Harry Vane, the younger, had his residence next to Northumberland House. Isaac Barrow, the divine, died in mean lodgings over a saddler's shop at Charing-cross. Rhodes, the bookseller, hung out his sign of the ship in the same locality. Here, according to that arch-gossip and prince of storytellers, old Pyne, William Hogarth stood at a window of his old Golden Cross making sketches of the heralds and the sergeant-trumpeter's baud, and the yeoman guard, who rendezvoused at Charing-cross, purposing to make a picture of the ceremony of proclaiming the new King, George III.; but nothing came of it but an inflammatory cold, which was cured by his friend, Dr. Hendley. It is to be regretted that so gay and picturesque a subject should have escaped the great master of character and humour.

OLD CHARING-CROSS, FROM AGGAS'S PLAN OF LONDON.

OPENING OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF IRELAND.

ON the 30th ult. the Irish National Gallery was opened by the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, after his Excellency had inaugurated the Dargan statue, on the site of the Great Exhibition. The hall was occupied by a crowded assembly of the nobility and gentry, and the leading citizens. Mr. Alexander Boyle, one of the hon. secretaries, read an address to the Lord Lieutenant, reciting the facts connected with the institution which he was about to open; and Lord Carlisle delivered an appropriate reply, in which he made emphatic mention of the services rendered to the undertaking by the Lord Chancellor, and lamented that the venerable Lord Chariemont had not been spared to appear among them on that occasion. He then declared the National Gallery of Ireland open. A vote of thanks to his Excellency was carried by acclamation. The National Gallery is in all respects a structure worthy of the country and of its purposes.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAYS.

Earl Powis asked Earl Granville whether he would state what course the Government intended to pursue in reference to the various schemes for metropolitan railways which were under public notice on this subject was to take place on the part of both Houses.

Earl GRANVILLE said that the subject had been very much under the consideration of the Government during the recess, and they had come to the conclusion that the best thing they could do was to carry out the recommendations unanimously agreed to by the Committee of the House of Lords' House which sat last Session. In accordance with these recommendations the Board of Trade had examined the various schemes which were now before them, both in regard to their merits and as to the degree in which they agreed with or differed from the recommendations of the Committee. They had made a full report to Sir Stafford Northcote, and they had also communicated with the Committee of the House of Lords' House on the previous Committee should be appointed to deal with the matter, or whether it should before they were referred in detail to Select Committees. The Government, therefore, thought that the best mode of proceeding would be to appoint, as in the Committee of last year was, that a Committee should be appointed to such House, and that those Committees should sit together for the consideration of these projects as a whole.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

The Archbishop of YORK moved for copies of two reports of Committees of the Ecclesiastical Commission. He was sorry to find that the constitution of the Ecclesiastical Commission was a body receiving much, doing little, and especially neglecting the spiritual interests of the Church. It was a most singular thing to speak of the Ecclesiastical Commission as if its main object was to provide for the spiritual wants of large towns. He did not take quite the same view of its functions. Previous to its appointment, the clergy were principally divided between pluralists and curates, the former of whom pluralists had been nearly abolished, and the consequence was that it had been necessary to build residences for a great number of curates. The principal duty of the Commission was to redistribute the revenue of the Church in such a way as to meet the altered state of things. He did not say that it was not right to the augmentation of poor livings the surplus revenues of the dean and chapter property, but he thought that the duty of the Church was to use its funds to the utmost extent in augmentation of poor livings, and not to allow it in perpetuity to meet local claims; and had raised the income of every benefice with a population of 10,000 to £600 per annum. He did not think the rule applied to those objects; and one of the papers which he was moving for would show the nature and extent of the claims which were made upon the funds the Commission hoped to carry on during the next five years. In that time they hoped to be able to augment ten benefices every year, and thus accomplish a work of equal amount in all of the augmentation of small livings, or in raising, as they had done, the value of benefices to £600 a year, and thus provide a remedy for every evil which the multiplication of livings had created.

Lord HATHERLEY said that the Archbishop had avoided all reference to that item in the Estimates which referred to the Ecclesiastical Duties, and especially excited the public distrust and disapprobation. He alluded to the enormous expense of managing the property of the Church in the Metropolis. There amounted to no less than £50,000 per annum, a sum which appeared to show that some new arrangements were necessary.

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY believed that a great deal of misconception existed with regard to the above management of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' funds. The first consisted of the expenses of the establishment in London; the second was the cost of managing the property in London, which was in the hands of the Commission; and the third, the expenses of those transactions which were carried on between the Commissioners and the Bishops, Deans, and Chapters, with regard to the sites of cathedral and other buildings, and the estates held on each rent, and as soon as the arrangements on the means were completed, the Commissioners did not anticipate that there would be any possible order each of these heads; but, at all events, it should always be remembered that the surplus of the Commissioners' funds were not the property of heads of expenditure.

Earl PORTMAN objected to the management expenses of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and censured their policy in frittering away the funds at their disposal in a number of small augmentations of poor livings instead of with a view to eventually carrying out some large and comprehensive scheme for the benefit of the Church at large.

The Bishop of LONDON said that he should answer for every part but the Bench of Bishops were responsible for the financial administration of the Ecclesiastical Commission. That was the duty of the Board of Commissioners, of which the Earl of Chichester was the representative in the House. He had no doubt of the integrity of their accounts, and as to the salaries of the clerks and his right rev. brethren were not anxious than that a full investigation should be made into those expenses, and the most searching scrutiny of the whole.

The Earl of CHICHESTER said that there was no evidence to show that the property in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was managed more economically than that in the hands of private persons. The whole matter would be found on examination to be very complex, and those most be borne in mind—a point very often overlooked by the critics of the Commission.

The Bishop of LLANDAFF said that he did not agree with those who thought the complicated nature of the property which came into the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. This complication was necessary, and, if it were, to great part incurred only once, and ceased when the arrangements of the property became simplified. He thought the Commissioners themselves had been fully reformed to the Ecclesiastical Commission arose from the exaggerated expectations which had been entertained of it. It was to be feared that the entire ecclesiastical revenues of the country were inadequate for the spiritual wants of the people, and that the Commissioners were not to be blamed for the impossibility of satisfying all claims upon them.

In reply to Lord Chichester, the Lord CHANCELLOR promised within a few days to lay on the table the Returns for striking off the list the names of all the peer livings in the gift of the Lord Chancellor. He had been fortunate enough to sit on the bench forty-four years, and had never exercised any of the original bill (which enabled him to augment small livings) having been rejected, he had been unable to do anything with the peer livings in his gift. The prices obtained for the livings sold had exceeded his most sanguine expectations. Twenty-four livings more sales would be effected, when the whole, he considered that the working of the Act had been most satisfactory.

The House rose at half-past 6.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY, FEB. 5.

A large number of private bills were read a first time.

Sir Hugh Cairns gave notice that on the 17th he should ask the Vice-Chancellor of the Queen's Household whether the Lord Chancellor's plan was prepared to carry out the Bankruptcy Act, and whether any alterations would be made for securing the Act for the future.

Mr. Fernand gave notice that on Thursday he should move for returns with reference to the usage and application of the fees of the superannuated law officials in connection with the Charitable Estates and Trusts Acts of 1853 and 1855.

Mr. A. Mills gave notice of his intention to move for a return of the expenses connected by the removal of the Courts of Law.

Mr. Buxton gave notice that on Tuesday he should move the resolution of which he had given notice in reference to the state of the Church of England in Ireland.

In reply to Mr. D. Fortescue, the Marquis of Hartington stated that, following the precedent in the case of the Irish Church Commission, the proceedings of the late court-martial on Colonel Crealock, together with the evidence taken in the evidence, would be laid before the House.

Mr. R. Hodgson asked if it was true that the gun-boat Lively, which was wrecked on the coast of Ireland, was going to be sold, and whether it was intended to take the sea to a storm.—Lord C. Paget said the gun-boats mentioned by the Admiralty could not be considered satisfied or as ever having been built by the hon. gentleman that they had been largely employed in China.

In reply to Sir H. Bruce, Mr. Gladstone said the Government had not received a petition from Manin praying for reform in the constitution and government of the Ionian Islands.

In answer to Captain Arkwright, Mr. Gladstone stated that a report from the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the alleged grievances of the Italian army, and he had no objection to lay it on the table.

Sir P. Pakington drew attention to the case of Mr. Bernard, a subject of the English merchant, who had been arrested by the Portuguese authorities, and asked to what extent the Government would feel themselves justified in enforcing the establishment.

Mr. Gladstone said the first question might have been postponed until the Army and Navy Estimates were laid before the House. He assured the hon. gentleman that the consideration which pressed upon his mind might be dispelled; but, though they hoped to make some reduction in charges, there would be no material reduction of the military force beyond that which was the natural consequence of the transfer of the Ionian Islands to the kingdom of Greece. He regretted that he could not give the hon. gentleman any plain, simple, and satisfactory answer to the question. "But it is not the latest, and it is very undesirable that it were should be the habit, of Her Majesty's Government to state prospectively what course they will adopt in the event of any unforeseen circumstances which have not yet happened. The future is a closed book, and those who attempt to read it very often find themselves in the position of false interpreters. But I may be permitted that if, under any circumstances, it should be the opinion of the Government, supported by Parliament and the country, that any portion of it should be made, either military or naval, the resources of the country and the spirit of the country would be found equal to the occasion. And therefore the hon. gentleman may rest confident that, whatever future circumstances may require, the country will be always able to find the means of sustaining its responsibilities. But I must decline stating what the course of policy of the Government will be in the event of any such contingency. I am sure the House will feel that it would be unwise in me, and, of course, it will be the duty of the responsible advisers of the Crown to form an opinion upon the subject when the occasion arises."

The motion was agreed to.

THE MALT DUTY.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means. The object of the motion was that he might bring in a bill to allow the making of malt duty free to be used in feeding cattle. In referring to the subject, he said he was aware that the feeding of cattle, and the desirability of a fair experiment taking place as to whether, the malt could be used with advantage for the purpose, had been frequently expressed his satisfaction that the authorities of the department of Inland Revenue had been willing to meet the wishes of the agricultural interest to the revenue dependent on malt. He did not enter into the provisions of the bill, which were simple and easy, and which would be worked in connection with the system of malt-making cattle. The bill would be for two years only, as the Government thought it desirable that the trial should be made throughout the greater part of the year, and not merely in winter.

Sir J. KELLY congratulated the agricultural interest on this the first movement which had been made in the House for thirty years.

Colonel BARTTELOT hoped the measure was not introduced for the purpose of preventing the repeal of the malt duty. If the malt duty abolished he was prepared to desist from their attempts to obtain a modification of the malt duty, which was to their ultimate profit.

Sir E. DERING considered that the measure would prove as advantageous to the consumer as to the farmer, and he should give unqualified support to the bill.

After some remarks from Mr. Scholefield, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Bentinck, Mr. Hardcastle, and Mr. Hunt, a member of Alderman Salomons, Mr. Malcolm (who read a letter from Munich as to the value of malt for feeding cattle), and other gentlemen,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in compliance with some suggestions, said he would not object to the bill being read a first time, but should not take it any further until the following day.

The House went into Committee, and leave was given to bring in the bill.

COLLECTION OF TAXES.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in introducing a bill to amend the machinery for the collection of the income and property tax, said he regretted as persons who had to collect the Government revenue were subject to many clerks, while he had doubts as to whether the assessors should be local or not. He had, however, had numerous conferences, related to collectors, among whom there had been frequent conversations in the House. The bill, he said, was, therefore, not a hasty one, but had been considered by the Government. England the system which is at present in operation both in Ireland and Scotland, and which, he believed, I believe would work well in England, with respect to Scotland,[1] may say I know works exceedingly well, and to the satisfaction of the country in large. Although the bill might fairly be called a Conservative measure, it was not a Conservative measure in principle, as sometimes amount to positive grievances. There is, in the first place, the grievance of the collectors, who were appointed by the Crown for their lives, but, although they are local officers, they are not popularly elected. They were appointed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the assessors, and their remuneration from the commissioners; and the commissioners derive their remuneration from the Treasury. Therefore, as the bill now stood, there would have no immediate connection with the appointment of the collectors; but, nevertheless, matters would go on very much as they were, and, as it was under the control of the Executive Government, the law has of necessity been obliged to be very stringent. The bill, he said, was not one which could shall be exempt from the income tax. The bill was also intended to remedy the bringing any general charge against the body of collectors—that cases of notice of appeal had been lost by the collectors' delay to serve them in proper time and manner. This is no mere abstract grievance. Again, taxpayers had to complain that they had to pay the costs of appeal, and, in addition to its grievances, delays frequently arising in the collection of the tax. Then the assessors, who were also Government nominated, had to complain that the appointment was compulsory, and cases had been known where assessors had appointed themselves in order to avoid the responsibility of being compulsorily assistant with their station in life. Among the gentlemen who have been appointed assessors, I find a great many of the middle class, and, as a matter of fact, I find a great many of the middle class, and, as a matter of fact, merchants absent from home during the entire day, owing to their duties to the principals of their establishments, are compelled to appoint their clerks as assessors. It is a fact also that assessors have sometimes nominated persons of their own class, and not the best qualified. That is a matter of fact, and one which it is surprising has been tolerated so long. Of course, general officers and inspectors would be appointed to look after the collectors and educational pursuits when they are nominated collectors of taxes; but they would be in a position to be called upon to make inquiries and report to the head of the law for not performing a duty that ought never to have been laid upon them. The bill, he said, proposed to remedy these evils by making the collectors independent of the assessors, and by providing that the assessors should not have to their own hand. An interval must then be allowed, and if within that interval the tax was not paid the collector would be under no liability, but in the eye of the law for not performing a duty that ought never to have been laid upon him

MR. MADDOCKSON said the whole procedure of the Home Office was open to question, and the administration of the criminal law through the Home Office ought to be a violation of the law.

MR. HADFIELD thought the best mode of proceeding would be by a Royal Commission.

MR. LUCRE could not understand why Townley was not executed, as long as the system of capital punishment was in force.

SIR G. BOWYER was of opinion that there was no blame whatever to be attached to the Home Secretary. He regretted, however, that Wright was not reprieved, for there was a very prevalent impression amongst the lower orders that there was one law for the rich and another for the poor.

After a few words from Sir S. Lefevre,

MR. HENNESSY said that Mr. Hardcastle seemed very unhappy that Townley had escaped capital punishment. Now, he (Mr. Hennessy) thought if he had been in Townley's position he would gladly have been shot, as he would have been glad to have been shot in the Crimea, rather than suffer the torture had escaped death. The explanation of the Home Secretary must be satisfactory to everyone, and he was sure that the hon. and learned gentleman who would have acted differently. It was unfortunate that the other case alluded to had happened, both for the Government and for the administration of the case before them. The two cases ought to be isolated, and he believed that in such cases every individual would be treated alike, without the slightest regard to rich or poor. The poor had not the means to employ such able counsel as the rich could afford, but he thought, in fact, that in these cases always be a difference between rich and poor. The state, in these cases, was bound to see that the prisoner had every opportunity of defence afforded him as long as there was capital punishment in force. The only question that remained. He did not know that anyone would have acted more fairly than the Secretaries of State, but capital punishment was a question of great importance and the feelings of the times, and he was astonished that the Secretary of State had not taken his own and responsible view of it. He was sorry as he was of anything that the abolition of capital punishment would not had to an increase of the crime of murder.

SIR J. PAKINGTON cordially approved of the steps taken by the Secretary of State in the case of Townley. He thought that the hon. and learned member for the ebbsgate which the Home Secretary had to suffer came from the delay occasioned by the Glasgow case, but he was bound to admit that in the instance he had not deserved it. Both the administration and the principle of justice Townley had not been ultimately executed, especially after the creditable feeling which had been shown by the right hon. gentleman in the case of Wright.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY SCHEMES.

MR. M. GIBSON rose for a Select Committee to consider the best method of dealing with the Metropolitan railway schemes, and to report their opinion whether any, and if any what, of the schemes ought to be sanctioned during the present Session. Also that a message be sent to the Lords acquainting them that the House had appointed a Committee, and requesting that their Lordships to appoint an equal number of Lords to be joined with the members of the Commons to consider the subject. The hon. gentleman said that the estimated expense of projected railways within the limits of the metropolis was between £20,000,000 and £30,000,000, and that during the last few years of the City proper had been scheduled for railway purposes, he was sure they would agree with him that the time had arrived when it was necessary not only to take upon themselves the responsibility of recommending the course to be pursued.

MR. CRAWFORD expressed disapprobation of the proposal to appoint a joint reference, as he understood its wording, would relegate to the Committee part only of a very large and comprehensive question, which ought to be considered imperiously demanded a settlement at the hands of Parliament. The Committee would be unable to satisfactorily to themselves report upon the various schemes for which bills had been sent before Parliament.

LORD PALMERSTON said that in the present state of this question the most practical step would be to appoint a Royal Commission for the purpose of investigating and reporting upon the best mode of dealing with the railway communication, but with such river and street communication as the necessities of the metropolis required. He had no doubt that a Commission of that peculiar character would be appointed in this case.

MR. HASSEY was of opinion that a very little extension of the existing railways would supply almost all the wants of the metropolis, and that instead of destroying the town in all directions, as was contemplated by the various projects now before them. He hoped the Government would not be induced to inquire by a joint Committee of both Houses.

LORD J. MANNERS concurred in the opinion expressed by his noble friend and thought the proposal of a joint Committee of the two Houses was both too late and insufficient for any practical purpose.

MR. J. SHELLEY also described the proposal as crude and unsatisfactory, and hoped the Government would advantage of the present occasion to withdraw it.

The amendment was seconded by Lord ENFIELD, who advocated the appointment of a Royal Commission, with a right to examine witnesses on oath.

MR. Crawford, Mr. Schofield, Sir M. Peto, Mr. Slowey, Lord Fermoy, and Mr. Locke participated in the discussion which followed, after which the House having consented to withdraw his amendment, the motion for a Committee was agreed to.

The Committee was appointed to consist of Mr. M. Gibson, Lord Stanley, Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Locke, Mr. Peto, and Mr. Hassey, and it was ordered that a message should be sent to the Lords informing them of the appointment of the Committee, and requesting that their Lordships would be pleased to appoint an equal number of Lords to be joined with the members of this House."

On the motion of Mr. Gibson, it was ordered that the Petitions Nos. 152 to 175 be suscribed as regards all petitions for railway bills authorising the construction of works within the limits of the metropolis, and that the fees paid for any such bill be presented to the House until the day after the report from the Select Committee on Railway Metropolis Schemes shall have been laid upon the table.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.—Lord SIDNEY brought up the Queen's answer to the Address :—"Your loyal and affectionate Address has given me the highest satisfaction. I thank you sincerely for the congratulations which you offer to me and to the renewed assurances of loyalty and attachment to my person and family. I am deeply sensible of the duty which devolves upon me to promote the welfare and happiness of my people."

MODERN ARTILLERY.—Lord HARDWICKE, after referring to some recent experiments, asked whether the Iron Duke would be armed with such projectiles that would be effective against ships plated with 4½ inches of iron.—The Duke of SOMERSET gave a detailed statement of the kind of projectiles with which it is proposing the Navy with effective artillery. The Government had obtained the and 100 pounders that would penetrate 4½ inches of iron plating, and to procure an effective broadside gun.—Lord DE GREY explained the cause of delay in the manufacture of the Armstrong gun, and expressed a hope that the Government, any wish to favour one competitor for the supply of arms over the others.

THE ALABAMA.—In answer to a question from Lord Wodehouse, Lord Russell stated he had ascertained that Mr. Seward had written to Mr. Adams the despatch respecting the case of the Florida and Alabama. The vessels were fitted out by the commerce of the North from the captures made by the Alabama. Mr. Adams had received the despatch, but had not communicated it.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH.—I have given private notice to the noble Earl opposite that I would put a question to him on a matter of great interest to Denmark. I think it may be good to made for this course, and that, under the circumstances, we should be right in doing so. I am aware that, of course, the noble Earl would not think it right to answer any question that might exceed such other as hourly that the future becomes the present, and the present the past, as regards that it is impossible to foresee the course of forms which are customary to those matters in a deliberative assembly. I think also that the Queen's Lordships would be right in not pressing for addressing a few words to you upon this subject, inasmuch as it is by many others about it. As that is the case, I should nevertheless like to wish to state to the House what took place then, inasmuch as in some of the newspapers there appeared a statement which, if correct, would undoubtedly have been made with more discretion and some other things. When my noble friend behind me (the Earl of Derby) was Prime Minister of this country, office has been held by my noble friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (but do not see in his place (Earl Granville), who had succeeded Lord Palmerston in that office, and the whole of his colleagues, and myself, were from the Government of which the noble Earl was a member. The negotiations respecting the treaty of succession to the throne of Denmark had remained for the noble Earl (Earl Granville) to do but to arrange some of the details. A question had arisen as to the terms on which he made a party to the treaty on the same footing as the other Powers. I had been informed that the noble Earl opposite was prepared to say he would be that the Powers of the Diet, but he was told that any reference to the Diet would make the business interminable—that was the word used by one of the Ministers—and the consequence was that that idea was altogether abandoned by the Danish Government, and they were told distinctly that they did not require that to be done. It then remained for me to settle the question of the remuneration of the Prince of Augustenburg, and I thought that it was desirable that this renunciation should be obtained, otherwise he might be useless to attempt to obtain from the Duchies. Sir Roy A, which was four days before the treaty was signed in London, the Duke of Augustenburg was not in a position to renounce his claims, now Prime Minister of Prussia, was responsible for what was going forward. I negotiated the arrangement with the Duke. The Duke of Augustenburg was to receive the sum equal to £250,000 Sterling, and in his own terms and that of his family to agree never to interfere with the succession in Denmark, as arranged by that treaty. My Lords, I cannot conceive any agreement more solemn than that. He thanked the English Government, without whose interposition he would never have obtained such favourable terms, for the part they had taken; and, he said, that he promised, privately as well as publicly, that he would not interfere with the succession. As to the payment of money, the first instalments were paid, and I believe they were about made continued. At that time, during the tenure of office by my noble friend behind me and myself, we never heard one word of protest from himself or from his son about this agreement. The protest—if protest was two years after—was sent to us from the Duke of Augustenburg, and I was informed that it was so, and that if he had objected to the conditions his father accepted he knew this was of no answer would be given to it. Under these circumstances, as the whole matter has been written by the noble Earl opposite with reference to the King of Denmark not having fulfilled the pledge to which he was bound in honour. I think he was bound in honour to keep those promises, and I believe there is a little [illegible] in the matter. I have thought it necessary, my Lords, to state my say on the point of honour to the Duke of Augustenburg's son after all this time, and I have thought that the interest we have in the fate of one of the present state of things? My Lords, that was the whole part that I took in this matter. I have only to add that I hope that the noble Earl opposite will be able to give us some information on the part that he has taken in this affair again, and we found the Germans very much excited on the question, the Duke of Augustenburg's claims, and the Duke of Augustenburg's claims to their promise, and a great deal of correspondence took place in Germany on the subject. I hope the noble Earl will be able to give us some light on it. In attendance on her Majesty when she went to Germany; and I was present when I was [illegible] and the noble Earl's conversations I had with leading persons, some of them at Berlin and Vienna, and I was informed that the Duke of Augustenburg's heir allowed these conversations to pass without laughing that any letter, which he might write to the Duke of Augustenburg, would be of no effect.

THE CHARING-CROSS RAILWAY.

LONDON is gradually but rapidly undergoing such a complete metamorphosis that in the space of a few years it will be difficult to trace out even its best-known sites or most prominent features. The traveller who, after ten years' sojourn in other lands, shall retrace his steps to London will be scarcely able to make out portions of it once the most familiar to his eye, and will be disposed to say of town, in language similar to that in which Bottom's companions addressed him, though it is to be hoped not so depreciatingly—"Oh, London! thou art transformed!" The bridges over the Thames are, of course, among the most prominent and noticeable features of our metropolis. These are to be, or have been recently, nearly all rebuilt, and many new ones erected and in progress. The great thoroughfares of town remain, but the houses in them are rapidly changing in appearance. Many of the second and third rate streets have been altered; thousands of the poorer habitations have been swept away, and many new streets have been opened up to the public. The transformation is still going on; new railways and other companies threaten us on every side; the Thames Embankment will of itself make a wonderful change in the appearance of London; and our only fear is that we shall be "improved" off the face of the earth, so many are the schemes for our benefit. Our position in this respect has at length attracted the attention of Parliament, which seems now to have determined upon placing some slight barriers against the attacks of our numerous besieging engineers. If the Parliamentary Committee to be appointed to inquire into the various plans will only see to confining each effort within proper bounds, and to protecting us from conflicting schemes, we shall have much to be thankful for. Up to the present time we have suffered comparatively little injury.

In no part of London has a greater improvement been made than upon the spot where Hungerford Market once stood. Not a vestige of the various attractions now remain. The fishmongers who once carried on business in this West-end Billingsgate have all dispersed to settle down here and there in various places in and about the Strand. As if by a wave of a railway enchanter's wand the elegant Hungerford suspension bridge which once graced our river has been removed 120 miles away—to Clifton, and a new and more solid bridge erected in its stead. The Hungerford Assembly-ball is among the things of the past; every approach to what was once the market, and to the riverside between Villiers-street and Craven-street, has been altered, and the site is occupied by an immense railway station—the West-end terminus of the Charing-cross Railway. This station is not quite finished, so we will not now enter into a minute description of it. Suffice it here to say, that it stands about 100 ft. from the Strand roadway, that it has about 200 ft. width of frontage, and that its ground floor will be set apart for booking-offices, refreshment-rooms, &c., and all its upper stories will be used for hotel purposes. In the open space between the roadway and the station carriages will deposit passengers after passing through the lodge gates at the entrance, and in its centre will be erected—not far from the spot where the original memorial stood—a facsimile of the ancient Eleanor Cross which once adorned the village of Charing, and gave the name to the neighbourhood which it to this day retains.

TEMPORARY ENTRANCE TO THE STATION FROM VILLIERS-STREET.

COVERED WAY LEADING TO THE PLATFORM.

The arrangements of the Charing-cross Railway Company, incomplete as they are at present, are yet sufficiently advanced to provide for a large amount of public traffic, and we have thought it advisable to show, by some illustrations which we give in this Number, the extent of the accommodation. Turning from the Strand down Villiers-street, we at once perceive a great alteration. Dingy dwellings have been cleared away, the new railway-station's massive side shows in lofty pre-eminence on our right hand, and bright, business-like shops and refreshment-rooms behind the opposite side of the way. Lower down, we come upon a turnstile whereat foot passengers wishing to cross the river pay the usual halfpenny toll and then walk on. Footways, we find, of about 7 ft. in width have been made for their convenience upon each side of the railway bridge. At the bottom of Villiers-street is a communication by means of which steam-boat passengers use the Hungerford landing-pier. From that pier we have a near view of the new

CHARING-CROSS RAILWAY STATION,

This magnificent structure, with a semicircular roof of iron and glass, far exceeds in span the much-admired roofs of the Great Northern Railway at King's-cross, which are only 105 ft., while these are nearly 200 ft. The passenger platforms at present in use project beyond the limits of this glass roof, upon a part of the bridge, which widens out from the ordinary breadth of four lines of rail into a familiar form, containing seven lines. In February, 1860, the entire railway works were begun, and when we look upon the vast extent of labour here accomplished, we must admit that the time has been well occupied. The contract was enormously heavy, considering the short distance of the line—scarcely two miles—for in its brief limits are comprised seventeen bridges; 190 brick arches, of which eighteen are over streets; an iron viaduct of 404 ft. over the Borough Market; the Charing-cross station, the iron in whose roof weighs over 1200 tons; and the Charing-cross railway-bridge, containing 5000 tons of wrought and 2000 tons of cast iron. At present trains run from Charing-cross every quarter of an hour, beginning at ten minutes past seven in the morning, up to twenty-five minutes past twelve at night; and there are 140 journeys made daily to and from Greenwich, and thirty-four on the Mid Kent line. On the 1st of March the line, it is expected, will be open for North Kent traffic; and upon the 1st of May will be in working order throughout for South-Eastern and Continental business. On the latter date the cabmen attached to the station will all appear in uniform.

THE TEMPORARY ENTRANCE to the station will hereafter serve only for empty cabs, which will by this way pass up towards the arrival-platform, on the western side, near where the Charing-cross and Hungerford Bridge terminates, to examine luggage brought by the Continental train. The cab-rank is now stationed there, and will first receive any other cabriolets in temporary enclosure. Passing by the rank, and under a shed to protect from the weather, we now enter the tunnel-bridge used for passengers, which we have named, perhaps too untechnically,

THE TUNNEL ENTRANCE.

This passage, pitched with wood for horse traffic, is not pleasant for tender feet to traverse; but we are obliged to accept the excuse that it is to be used by but few persons, and that it is not a sufficient explanation. Its length, great as it appears to be at first sight, is not so extensive as the width of the station above, for beyond are offices for the porters and other servants of the company.

THE SIGNAL STATION,

next to Charing-cross, is remarkable for the ingenious character of its arrangements. By the use of one of Saxby and Farmer's patent signalling instruments one man is enabled to control the action of the numerous trains in and out of the station without difficulty; whereas, by the old-fashioned plan at least half a dozen men at a time would have been required, and even they could not have succeeded so well in discharging the duties of this very onerous post. Of course the labour cannot now be performed without considerable care: there are, indeed, three separate men employed at this one station, to relieve each other in turn. Posted in a glass room right over the lines, and commanding a full view both up and down, the signalman is enabled not only to communicate with the men in charge of the engines the switches which he at least 100 yards off. When a train is about to leave the station, he by means of a bell rings "ready to go;" whereupon, if all be well, the signalman adjusts the signal and, if necessary, opens the gates. The signal-box at the other end of the bridge (from the signal-box they call the Belvidere) shows all to be right, and when the train goes, the signal is changed at this station in the same way—namely, from Charing-cross to Belvidere, from Belvidere to Waterloo-junction, from Waterloo-junction to Blackfriars, and from Blackfriars to London Bridge. The amount of vibration felt upon the new Charing-cross Bridge as the heavy trains pass over it is very slight, scarcely more than upon the solid ground, and the bridge is reckoned to be one of the strongest ever built. It is eight feet wide, and is formed as an amount of wear and tear which would soon tell upon an insecure structure. The piers which are to be built for the Greenwich trains and the North and Mid Kent lines will be supplemented, in a year or two, by another bridge, to accommodate the every-five-minute traffic. The new line we refer to will be that to Lewisham, for which, at present, there is only a single line of rails provided. A person may now go from Charing-cross to Blackfriars, by means of the new bridge, in five minutes; or to London Bridge in ten minutes: to Spa-road in fourteen minutes; to Deptford in twenty-one minutes; and to Greenwich in twenty-five minutes. In twenty-two days more, if all be well, the Greenwich line and the fares are some of them very low, though, perhaps, not yet so small as they may become. Between Charing-cross and London Bridge, by third class, a person may go for 3d.; and he may be carried to and fro for 6d. more. The Greenwich fare is only 1d.

RAILWAYS IN THE CITY OF LONDON

Mr. Heywood, the engineer to the Commissioners of Sewers for the Corporation, has made a report in reference to the different railways proposed to be brought into or connected with the City, which has been the present session of Parliament.

It appears that there are no less than twenty-three projects, all more or less affecting the City, that will have to be considered by the Committee, as follows:—The Blackfriars Embankment Roadway and Railway, the Charing-cross Railway (additional), the Bow and Bromley Railway, the Cannon-street Railway, the London and Blackwall Railway Extensions; the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway (various), the Metropolitan Railway, the London Main Trunk Underground Railway, the London Union Railway, the Metropolitan Great Northern Railway, the Metropolitan Railway (Tower-hill), the Metropolitan Railway (Extension to Trinity-square, Tower-hill), the North London Railway (Additional Powers), the Southwark Railway (Additional Powers), the Oxford-street and City Railway, the Thames Viaduct Railway, the Tottenham and Forest-gate Railway, the Victoria Railway, the Victoria Docks and Thames Junction Railway, the Victoria Docks Railway, the Court of Justice Construction (acquisition of site), the Holborn Valley Improvement, the Thames Embankment (North Bank Completion) Bill.

After giving a summary description of the different projects above enumerated, and stating that a few of them have been already sanctioned by Standing Orders of the House of Commons, and one or two have been withdrawn, Mr. Heywood proceeds to say that the whole of the railways which they have proposed to be made in the City, or within its jurisdiction, in short twenty-one miles of railway, if all the projects mentioned in the twenty-three Bills or descriptions of notices to about 211 acres, but many parts are rather notice by two, three, or four times over, so that the actual area of land required will be more than about 150 acres. Within a less distance than a mile from the City the public ways of all descriptions which are interfered with will be about 100 miles in length, and the houses to be taken down about 4000, or nearly one in every acre. As to the sewerage within the City, it may be said of a very large portion that it is already fully overloaded, and that the proposed railways are entirely different plan. What the actual alteration may be will be a subject of serious and detailed consideration.

There probably never was a city threatened at once by so many projects as the City of London at the present time, and the present is a favourable time for settlement, in one Session, so many schemes which affected the metropolis; for the Government have announced their intention of introducing a measure of greater importance to such districts as are described, two companies propose buying up and utilising the Thames Embankment roadway, and the Queen's Theatre will be pulled down. The City of London Bill was one of the first with heights of 100 ft. above high water mark; another which is to cost Mr. Limehouse is equally remarkable. It is to be a suspension bridge, without any intervening abutments, and is proposed to be built. The Metropolitan Railway Company, Temple Bar, and the Metropolitan Railway Approaches' bill, and a part of the premises of the Times newspaper are also to be pulled down. In a few of these Bills, as in the Victoria Docks Railway Bill, Thames several lines proposed to take possession of a portion of the Thames Police purposes, and the Commissioners have consented to the use of the Thames Police purposes, and the Commissioners have consented to the use of the Thames Police purposes, and the Commissioners have consented to the use

Her Sister" (44), a more than usually good example of J. Webb; a sombre "Moor Scene" (302), by E. Hargitt; "Summer Evening" (331) and "Banks of the Thames"—two meritorious little landscapes by C. Smith; the carefully studied view "On the Sands, Isle of Wight" (471), by R. Collinson; "A Scene in Norbury Park" (154), by H. B. Grey; a large marine piece (153), by R. H. Nibbs; and "Study" (7), by C. Lissel, J. Wilson, R. Gill, H. Moore, A. Wolf, and A. Vickers.

A gorgeous picture of "Fruit" (233), by G. Lance, will be dwelt upon with admiration; and there are promising pictures of still-life by Mrs. Blomeand and T. Worsey. In addition to the animal pieces already noticed, there is a capitally painted pair of King Charles's spaniels, in a picture (668) by T. Bottomley, and others of the same category by T. Earl and A. Corbould.

There is a slight improvement in the display of sculpture, as in the pictures. A perfect model example of the style of the figure deserves special notice—viz., ideal heads, by F. M. Miller, J. D. Crittenden, Mr. Thorneycroft, Mr. Hulme ("The Sisters"), Mr. Lawlor (a fine engraved), and J. Lawler; a marble group of "St. John the Baptist," by G. C. Adams; and a sketch, by W. J. O'Doherty.

We have it from authority which may be relied upon that Government already contemplates setting apart one of the most important recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Fine Arts of last year. We allude to the building of a new National Gallery, to be solved by the Commissioners, on the large plot of ground at the back of Burlington House, Piccadilly; the removal to it of the National Gallery, and the transference of the site of that and the building in Trafalgar-square to the Royal Academy, in order to afford that body sufficient room for the annual exhibitions and for the schools, the latter being now necessarily closed during the months in summer that the exhibition is open. Plans for a new National Gallery have been prepared by Messrs. Banks and Barry, and will be submitted to the Board of Works early in June next. These plans are conceived upon a suitably large and liberal scale; yet the estimated cost of removal and erection will be only the comparatively moderate sum of £150,000. We are not at liberty to give full particulars; but we may mention that the architects propose to erect seven parallel galleries, the ground floor of each of these to be 900 ft. in length, which is about two thirds of the length of the whole of the present building in Trafalgar-square. The galleries will be uninterrupted from end to end; but in the centre there is to be a grand hall with columns, and this portion of the plan will have an imposing effect from numerous points of view. The galleries are to be 60 ft. in width, and 50 ft. in height, which is 10 ft. less than the measurement than was the unnecessarily vast picture gallery of the International Exhibition. If the Board of Works and Royal Parliament we shall certainly have the finest set of picture galleries in Europe. The principal entrance will be through Burlington-gardens, which will probably be another in Burlington-gardens, at the rear. The plan admits of other entrances being added if at any future time they should be required; and should we, or our children, be so disposed, the present Burlington House may be replaced by a frontage befitting our new Academy of Arts and our enlarged collection of sculpture and pictures.

A very interesting and valuable paper was read at the Society of Arts on Wednesday evening, the 3rd inst., upon a new process of engraving on steel or metal plates, discovered by M. Gillé, of Paris. The subject chosen is traced upon the plate, either by the hand of the engraver or by transfer from a photographic or other drawing (which is placed in contact with it), and passed through an ordinary copperplate press, when the ink is left in the incisions, and the artist rubs the impression to the surface of the plate. Old ink which has dried upon the surface may be wiped off with a rag with perfect success, as was shown in some specimens exhibited by M. Gillé, but the mode of effecting this was not fully explained, some reticence on this point being necessary from the nature of the secret which might be adopted to reproduce bank notes and similar works of art. The plate then passed to the etching-room, where a coating of wax or copper acidified with nitric acid. The process of engraving or etching commences immediately, and is completed in about half an hour. When the superficial deposit of copper is cleaned off, and the design is found perfectly proportioned in length and breadth, no trouble or sense in the ordinary process of etching. This is the distinguishing novelty of the process, and depends upon certain chemical effect not hitherto noticed, the explanation of which excited some discussion, in which Mr. George Cruikshank, Mr. Wallis, M. Jubinal, and Dr. Bachhoffner took part. Several proofs from plates by this process of perfectly engravings or sketches can be reproduced by this method without injuring the original; and it was generally admitted that in giving the novelty and ingenuity of the process and in auguring favourably of its success and usefulness.

THE OXFORD MIDDLE-CLASS EXAMINATIONS.

IN consequence of the Bishop of Oxford having consented to deliver the certificates and prizes to the successful candidates at the examinations for the Oxford Middle-class Examinations, a public meeting was convened for the purpose at the Sheldonian Theatre. The meeting took place on the 3rd inst., and at 12 o'clock was numerously attended, there being amongst those present the Vice-Chancellor, the Bishop of Oxford, Lord Lyttelton, Lord Ebury, Mr. C. Neate, and many other of the leading members of the University.

The Bishop of Oxford, who presided, prefaced the distribution of prizes by saying—In addressing to take the chair at the distribution of prizes to the successful here, there is no need of me to trouble you with many words, because the object of the meeting is sufficiently known to you all. The system having been tried for six years, and upon the whole it has proved itself, to all who have taken any interest in it, to be a system of great value and importance and so well organised as could not have been hoped by the most sanguine of those who first set it on foot. It is unnecessary for me to say that it is now considerably improved that its originators can scarcely as yet have hoped. Experience has taught us many things which we did not know at the outset, and we have so far found means of meeting them that we have not only manifest their joint interest in giving their aid to the furtherance of the re-creation of the middle classes of education throughout the land, but must redeem it is difficult to conceive, for there are not only direct acts of benefiting which are done as a good education, but there is a reflex influence which invites itself by impercipible means through the whole body of those who are brought under the influence of the examinations, but it is to extend sound instruction to a class below that class which within the last few years has received the name of the middle class, and which has been considered, and it is, indeed, a great boon to the country to make a Christian education worthy of the name it bears. We want something far beyond that which is usually rendered the portion of the poor, and which is extended to one kind of men; it is something more than the instruction of persons in some kind of profession or business, and we want to see it in men by education is the steering, lasting, and solid foundation in the character of the youth upon which the after superstructure of his life in the up shall rest. For there must be such a foundation of the internal character as shall enable the future man to withstand the temptations which bring to bear the powers which God in his great providence has given him, as, for instance, the power of wealth, the power of position, the power of office, the power exercised by the possession of talent, and the power of the press; not resisting to the end, being patient in all things, expecting many reverses, and of eating with which can be overcome by sufficiency of grace and faith. There must be all this mixture of the rational and moral character before there can be any thing like the structure of a true Christian man. And this, we must be the deep foundation of the religious character, upon which everything else is to rest, necessary to make a consistent consistent man. Without this the other superstructure can bear the strain that will be brought to bear upon it in the after years of manhood, ingenuity and accomplishments may be of ever and ever great value, and even when the temptation was strong enough against the man who has had nothing but these accomplishments to rely upon. The desire of the Oxford Middle-class Examinations is to assist the work of true education by bringing the moral and intellectual influence of the land to bear, by means of these examinations, by means of these certificates, and through the prizes which accompany them, amongst those who cannot reside in the University, in such a manner that they may have the direct supervision and many of the advantages of the Universities. . . . True education and the University have always gone hand in hand, great confidence in lending themselves to this attempt. The blessing of God has descended upon it, and we have seen the fruits of it in the numbers who have come up to its different years of our examinations, and upon the great light of Christian education extend and raise by its correspondence with the moral and intellectual standing of the great middle classes of the country.

The distribution of certificates and prizes was then proceeded with, and the Vice-Chancellor, the Mayor, Archdeacon Clerke, and others subsequently addressed the meeting.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

A RUMOUR floating from club to dinner-table, and thence to the drawing-room, has been heard in certain circles last week. It is that the Queen was so much offended with the part taken by Lord Russell on the Germano-Danish question that she wished to alter the Premiership. That, said the cast for Earl Derby, who stood by his order and refused to make the matter a Cabinet question. Queen Anne's heart, as we know from Swift's epigram, was "entirely English;" on the Schleswig-Holstein question that of Victoria is said to be entirely German. That the rumour we allude to is not without foundation we have reason to believe; but, as the Premier has yet no one can find where an occasion has taken place in the Speech. In the Speech, indeed, the Queen is made to recite some little history of the quarrel, and even those usually colourless periods warm up when speaking of the "cordial union" which they have been the means of. Majesty pulls up shortly to a tame and impotent conclusion. Just as one can see no reason for an appeal to a novel element, the general opinion of the French is that the Emperor's speech, so long the organ of "Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury."

The "rumour" will take some interest in the recent advertisement of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings inviting designs from architects for two new museums, to be erected on part of the land at South Kensington, recently purchased by the Government, and used in 1862 for the International Exhibition. It is understood, although not so stated, that one of these museums is intended to receive the natural history collection of the British Museum, and the other the collection of models belonging to the Commissioners of Patents. To the zoological removal, as the commencement of the disintegration of the British Museum, there will, probably be a strong opposition; but the museum of mode's already belongs to South Kensington, and will have to be removed on the way. The collection is extremely attractive; but it is as yet very incomplete and unsatisfactory. A well-arranged and comprehensive museum of models, machines, and specimens, illustrative of the progress of invention, would be a popular and highly interesting as well as instructive; and there is no country in which such a museum could be more appropriately placed than ours. Says a correspondent of the Times. The great country of the steam-engine should, indeed, be the country in such a museum would be memorable. This is the age of museums, which, if compared with the last century, shows a vast gain in one factor: then they did much to encourage popular error, which the enlightened of the present day seek to dispel. Take one or two obvious subject.

The Thames is in danger, and is, forsooth, a very ill-used river. Our poets have been liberal enough in their encomiums, as in "the fruitful Thames," "the silver flood," and his "glassy stream," his "silver-winding way," "the silver flood," "Royal-towered Thames," and a host of others. Spenser, in particular him, "old father Thames," and "loury Thames," and we worship him, in colossal statue and mask at Somerset House, and in some other places; and he has become a sort of river Punch. Meanwhile, we have poisoned him to the last—but we have not yet made him water which bedabbled the manners has, with its fat and sullage, grown into so strong a stuff that the bailiffs of Parliament have been obliged to dismember it, and to such an extent as to render the Thames scarcely worthy of the name of a river.

are to be reduced to the quill-like stream of a sentimental drinking-fountain. Sir John Rennie states that

At present the quantity of water that the quantity of fresh water passing over Teddington Weir (which is the limit of the tidal flow) during the dry season of the year is about 340 cubic feet per second; a channel of about 340 feet four feet deep, running at the velocity of three miles per hour. Now, as the water flows down the river, it becomes charged with the impurities of the sewage, and as the quantity thus increases is continually increasing with the population on the banks, the quantity of water which is required to dilute the sewage and the quantity of water which is discharged during flood and other causes, it naturally follows that the quantity of water which would belong to the Thames would be considerably less than 340 cubic feet per second, and to such an extent as to render the Thames scarcely worthy of the name of a river.

In other words, the Thames will be reduced to the state of an estuary; that is to say, it will depend mainly for its existence on the quantity of water which it receives from the discharged from the sea. Mr. Rennie shows that "the river Thames has been greatly neglected, and even injured;" that the time has arrived when it requires a different treatment has become necessary.

Mangin, the well-known conjurer, died the other day, after a glorious career, in Paris, "the very brain of France." He was the king of charlatans. To call him a "cheap jack" would offend the vanity of so true an artist. Mangin, in his early career as a waiter in a cart, but a renowned vender of blacklead pencils; he was already remarkable for his conversational powers and his inexhaustible fund of wit.

He was arrayed in a velvet tunic fringed with gold; burnished cuirass, sword and gauntlets, and a glittering casque with winged serpent and fall and flowing crest. His personal appearance was unusual: his countenance, that of the true Imperial cut, the extremities well waxed, and sticking out on each side like sea-urchins. A profusion of his open curassing was seen on his manly bosom, his confidential assistant, habited in similar but less gaudy costume, was at his side, and the two presented a fine contrast to the pale faces of our artists; he then shuffled off his mockery, and not so much exerted as delighted the audience with his performance on the violin, which was of a very high order. Mangin, the unapproachable conjurer, who always sat behind, was merely to grind his instrument when he was not playing it, and he did so with a will, and with a vengeance. Mangin's last appearance was at the Fare de la Madeleine, the space in front of the New Opera, or the Chateau des Fleurs, as it is called. It was the Champs Elysée de la Reine, and there on the ground in the official costume we have described, but, standing up to the knees in mud, Mangin, with his usual gaiety, and in the midst of a heavy shower before him a coffer filled with medals bearing his own likeness, and forthwith commenced his performance. Under the curious, sweet and soft rain, he encountered in this merry dirt Mangin pressed to newly Hebrew vendors of pencils in their hands, and, as he passed, he distributed to them, with a curious grace, a medal, and continued his progress. Mangin, the bright stuck up the enormous mass of the Arene. Then Mangin, with his usual gaiety, and in the midst of the rain, which was now thundering to his ears, he continued loudly at some individual, dressed, and suddenly lowered the visor of his helmet. The crowd, which had been attracted by the noise, came in front to hear the opening speech. A little more eccentric—Mangin raised his little finger, and the crowd, as if by magic, moved back, and, by degrees, up to the front of the carriage, opened his mouth as if to speak, but all at once shut it as suddenly, and, with a look of the most ludicrous despair, he began his address, consisting of knight-errantry at third-apparent burning, global chance, and other words of the most unintelligible nature. The crowd, which had been attracted by the noise, remained stunned with the eccentric figure with chin and glitter." A little abuse followed, and he concluded with, "I have got a medal for every one of you, and you shall have it, but you have to Mangin." Then, looking fiercely, as if some one addressed him, Mangin continued, "Yes, you shall have your medal." Somebody, who deserved as a notary, nobody came near him, and he said not a single pencil. One day, while he was performing at the Fete de Neuilly, a gentleman, Punch named: "the people—stupid asses! (said Mangin), as you all are, gentlemen, are not worthy of my talents, and I am a solitary and a philosopher." But morning he appeared dressed like Punch, and his manner was somewhat changed. Punch, he said, was a man of talent, and he was a man of talent. Punch, he said, was a man of talent, and he was a man of talent. Punch, he said, was a man of talent, and he was a man of talent

ALFRED TENNYSON, THE POET LAUREATE.

WE give above the Portrait of the Poet Laureate. The custom of crowning the victors of song is almost as early as poetry itself. In the reign of Theodosius it was abolished as a relic of paganism, but after the lapse of centuries, when, in the age of Petrarch, poetry shone out again with somewhat of its ancient lustre, the practice was revived, and Petrarch himself was publicly honoured with the laurel crown. Tasso received the same recognition. In Germany the Emperor Maximilian I. founded, A.D. 1504, a poetical college at Vienna, and reserved to himself the power of bestowing the laurel. It was conferred, among others, on Metastasio. The French had Regal poets, but none seem to have been crowned, and there is no certain information concerning the custom in Spain. No actual ceremony of crowning the Laureate appears ever to have taken place in our own land; but in the reign of Edward IV. a certain John Kay, dedicating to the King a history of Rhodes, styles himself his Majesty's "humble Poet Laureate." It seems certain that from very early times our Kings have retained in their household a person who was sometimes called the King's poet, sometimes the King's encomiator. It is probable that at length on some occasion the selected bard assumed the title of Poet Laureate without the actual ceremony of being crowned. Gower and Chaucer were Laureates; and in 1619 Ben Jonson was made Poet Laureate, with a pension of a hundred marks. In our own time the title has passed from Pye, through the survivors of the Lake school, until it rested—long may it rest!—on Alfred Tennyson.

Lincolnshire claims the honour of Tennyson's birth, and Trinity College, Cambridge, counts him among her adopted sons. While there, in 1829, he gained the Chancellor's gold medal for the best poem in English verse; and in the following year published his first volume of poetry. The Edinburgh Reviewers were, if we remember rightly, somewhat severe upon this, and complained of a want of rhythm in these early efforts, and of the absence of anything to indicate the true poetic fire. Whatever their defects, their author had a clear conception of his office (see the verses entitled "The Poet"), and in the next piece administers, as by anticipation, a rebuke to those who would censure him, both then and since, in the lines beginning—

> With thy shallow wit:
> Vex not thou the poet's mind,
> For thou canst not fathom it.

The volume published in 1832 shows a marked growth. Tennyson had already formed the design of a grand poem on the life of the mystic King Arthur—a design which many of the greatest poets, including Milton himself, have entertained, and which has also been attempted in our own time by Bishop Heber and Sir Bulwer Lytton. "The Lady of Shalott," the opening poem in this volume, and the piece entitled "Sir Launcelot and Queen Guinevere" in the following one, both written in the same metre, appear to be fragments of a first essay in this direction. In the former we see the author's first conception of "Elaine," and, comparing this with that, may see how the same subject becomes a different picture as the master's hand improves. "The May Queen," "The Palace of Art," and "The Dream of Fair Women" display great and varied powers, the two latter being full of classical pictures of rare beauty. The lines to "J. S." may be taken as a model of what is termed a letter of condolence. The tenderness and delicacy of the love which cannot refrain from uttering words of sympathy, though fearful they will only stir up the grief they fain would calm; the contempt of common-place words of comfort which are characterised as "vacant chaff well meant for grain," and the exact allusion to the lost friend which will really comfort the mourner, indicate a heart of largest sympathies; and poesy is more the offspring of the heart than of the mind; it must be felt before it can be uttered.

In 1842 Tennyson published a third volume, and, in the opening poem gives us another attempt at his favourite subject; but this time in another manner, and on a grander scale. It is called "Morte d'Arthur," and professes to be the eleventh book of an Epic in twelve, of which the rest had been destroyed as unworthy. This now contains a description of the last moments of the "blameless King and stainless man," when mortally wounded in "that great battle in the west," to which the more recent work, the "Idylls of the King," leaves him departing. Though written no long ago, this poem is not unworthy to form a sequel to the later effort.

"The Gardener's Daughter" is one of the most exquisite idylls in our language, in which the minutest observation of nature in tree, and sky, and flower; in an mal, and bird, and insect; is worked into a simple story of which the incidents are such as "might human life" but the interest is, and ever will be, new. It is a tale "to make an old man young;" and we return to it again and again as to a well-spring of reviving our own early life, and drinking in the freshness of that bright May day when

All the land in flowery squares
Beneath a broad and equal-blowing wind,
Smelt of the coming summer, as one large cloud
Drew down part of all the light and shade in part
Up to the Sun, and May from verge to verge,
And May with me from land to land.

Ay! truly,

Those old Mays had thrice the life of these.

The small poem entitled "St. Agnes" is a masterpiece of word-painting—never, but to the life, to be surpassed. "Locksley Hall," by the author, to the young man, a saint indeed.

Those first three volumes were gathered into one and were re-issued in 1845, with a noble dedication to Wordsworth.

"The Princess" was given to the world in 1848. In it the questions of woman's intellectual equality with man, and her social position in relation to him, are discussed in a whimsical story, full of sparkling poesy and lyrics of surpassing beauty and grace. The conclusion is admirably set forth in the following lines:—

For woman is not undeveloped man,
But diverse: could we make her as the man,
Sweet love were slain: his dearest bond is this
Not like to like, but like in difference.
Yet in the long years liker must they grow;
The man be more of woman, she of man;
He wain in sweetness and in moral height,
Her size the wrestling thews that throw the world;
She mental breadth, nor fail in childly care,
Nor lose the childlike in the larger mind;
Till at last she set herself in act with man,
Like perfect music unto noble words;
And so these twain, upon the skirts of Time,
Sit side by side, full-summed in all their powers,
Dispensing harvest, sowing the To-be,
Self-reverent each, and reverencing each in this Distinct in individualities,
But like each other ev'n as those who love.
Then comes the statelier Eden back to men:
Then reigns the world's great bridal chair and calm:
Then springs the crowning race of human men.

But a blank had fallen on our literature. In 1833, immediately after the publication of Tennyson's second volume, died Arthur Henry Hallam, the friend that was made to his own soul. And there he set himself to work, and through the lapse of sixteen years laboured slowly to rear a monument of his art to him whom he calls—

My friend, the brother of my love;
My Arthur, whom I shall not see
Till my widow'd race be run;
Dear as the mother to the son,
More than my brothers are to me.

And a noble monument it was that he gave to the world in 1849, under the title "In Memoriam." The progress of a first grief, the inability to believe it true that one who had lately filled so large a space in our outward life is withdrawn from it for ever, the thought that we should not feel it to be strange if that loved one were before us again, and all the loss and sorrow were a dream, the gradual softening down of the first grief into a tender legacy of love, the getting accustomed to the vacant place and missing counsellor, the sad delight of recalling particular scenes that we have visited with the dear one, and the word he uttered, and the very book he gave; the recounting of his virtues, the thought of what he would have been to us if he had lived, and what we ought to be to be worthy of him,—there are few of us whose hearts do not give ready and painful answer to these touches as these. Would we could all feel the resignation expressed in the lines—

I hold it true, whate'er befall—
I feel it when I sorrow most—
'Tis better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all.

No more touching utterances of human sorrow than this whole poem has broken upon the world since Shakespeare poured forth lament for Jonathan. But not alone from common experiences of grief does the poet build up a monument to his friend.

Ever, from nature, from the schools, he culls the richest and most varied gems wherewith to adorn the monument of his love. It is not only science here to give examples of these; we would rather point out generally the bent of Tennyson's genius, and leave our readers to gather the flowers for themselves. How should they, who look only for a pretty conceit or a surface description of Tennyson never suspect the deep moral and spiritual purpose, which will not suffer him to explain himself by a multitude of words, and in a single expression which will not suffer those who are capable of receiving it the idea he wishes to implant. Often a description there would occupy a page, and in the poetical matter of the art of words is given in a single adjective. And herein also does our age owe him deep thanks that he has done so much to preserve and broaden our noble English language in its purity in later times. No writer more than he has made us feel how like the language is to the race, how standard and how pure, how worthy even an able German critic has proplonsed it will acquire.

In 1855 the literary world was startled by the issue of "Maud," a production which was said by some to prove the author as mad as his hero, who was, however, proved to be "not mad but in his madness;" and, possibly, the hideousness of the vices of our age was better seen in their effect on a sensitive, poetical, refined mind, than they could have been through any other medium. The poet looked to the war then just breaking out as the scourge by which those vices should be corrected. Alas! we need a heavier scourge and sharper suffering to purge away those stains on our social and national life.

In the same volume with "Maud" were published other poems, some of which exhibited Tennyson's powers in a new light, as one who observes, and fixes for the attention of future ages, some individual passages of marked moment in the history of this. The public feeling of Wellington and the charge of the six hundred at Balaclava are events that stamp the character of the nation, and leave an impression that should not perish on those who are the witnesses of them. Of the same character, as occasioned by passing events, are the exquisite lines on the death of the Prince Consort and the welcome to the Princess of Wales.

But the grandest effort of Tennyson's genius is the "Idylls of the King," of which we are astonished to have such strange and varied opinions. Although characterised by the best features of its author, all excellences of poesy are here found but interior modes of purpose to which we have already alluded, and bearing evidence throughout of a desire to prepare for further and higher Biblical characters and the highest motive, there have not been wanting those who have stigmatised it as impure—unfit for books. If we find that such have read into it their own impure lives, instead of reading out of it the deep lessons of holiness contained in it, surely the men of England might learn how to triumph, by patient and long-suffering meekness, from the manner in her "whom her talent loved to call Enid the fair," but whom "a grateful people called Enid the good." Surely they might learn to hate scandal from the words let her tongue

Rage like a fire among the noblest names;
Polluting and defiling: for the rest,
Defaming and defouling, till she left
Each side of Camelot's fairest name for ever.

And, oh! surely the worst of us might learn, from the example of Merlin, not to slight the love of a woman, lest, like his, we, our wisdom be our snare, and through over-confidence in that we temper with temptation fall into sin, and we, too, lie as dead,

And lost to use and name and fame.

The book contains four stories, but they may all be considered as one, all centering in the portraits of "Arthur, the stainless man" continued incidentally throughout them all, but in such sort as to leave upon the mind varying impressions of the characters and the purposes of his life. That character is perfect, that purpose the noblest. We have not space to enter into the discussion of this, and can but leave it to every reader what we assert; but we think none who take the pains to do so will dissent from us until they come, it may be, to his parting with Guinevere, when some have found evidence of pride and self-righteousness which would, if they existed, destroy the picture of the perfect man. We think we can find no such pride in the imperfect reading of the complainants. Certain it is they did not strike the heart of the poet, for he puts words of all his rebuke,

Better the King's waste hearth and aching heart
Than those reanimate in thy place of light—
The mockery of my people, and their bane.

He passed, and in the pause she crept an inch
Nearer, and laid her hands about his feet.

And of that other, in which the charge of self-righteousness is founded,

Lo! I forgive thee, as Eternal God forgives!

The words are said in anguish, not in pride, and conveyed, as they were meant, to the Queen the assurance that his pardon was free, large, absolute as God's. Nothing can alter the impression of them:—

And he forgave me, and I could not speak.
His mercy choked me.
And blessed be the King who hath forgiven
My wickedness to him,
And blessed be my lord, my light and guide, Lord,
Who used me in the sacred mission
Among his warring senses to thy knights;
To whom my volume of confession,
Wrote not look up, or half despised the height
To which I would not, or I could not, climb,
I thought I could not breathe in that fine air—
Pure as the heart of Stainless Knighthood—
Nor I nor one who than her is more fair.
Than art the highest, most unselfish woman.

Nothing need be added to this to show that, however we may read, the poet has read himself clear from the charge of self-righteousness on him whom he portrays as Sublime man of stainless gentleman.

But there is yet another portrait in the book more wonderful even, as a work of art, than that of the King. Tennyson himself tells how a portrait should be painted:—

As when a painter, poring on a face,
Divinely through all hindrance finds the man
Behind it, and so paints him that his face,
The shape and colour of a mind and life,
Lives for his children, ever at its best
And fullest; so perhaps have I painted mine,
Dark—splendid, speaking in the silence, full
Of suppressed power.

And so it lives before us. In the wondrous word-picture of Lancelot, of which the touches are scattered through the volume, we see all the man. Lancelot, a noble man he was. Brave, "the flower of bravery;" courteous and kindly; an example to modern gentlemen:—

Then the great knight, the darling of the court,
Loved of the loveliest, into that rude hall
Stept with all grace, and not one heart all shaken
Hid under grace, as in a smaller stone,
The mightiest man moving among men.

Of stately presence—

By thy state
And presence I might guess thee chief of those,
After the King, who sit in Arthur's hall.

Genial and pleasant—

Being mirthful he, but in a stately kind.

A valiant soldier and sage leader, for the King terms him,

Sir Lancelot, saw—his mightiest of knights.

And, again,

Lancelot, my Lancelot; thou in whom I have
Most love and most affiance, for I know
What thou hast been in battle by my side;

and, in the tourney,

King, Duke, Earl,
Count, Baron, whom as smoke he overthrew.

But, with all this, so full of noble forbearance, waiting to see which error or frailty would prevail in him, so "gentle in against the stronger;" and at the tilt many a time seen to Strike down his fellow of the purest knight,

And let the weaker and mishitting go by,

so that he "won all hearts."

And to this power was united so much grace and versatility as none could resist. Lancelot, "the most magnificent," "the most loyal friend and of nature" that won all hearts.

And he, that bare the sword to smite a tall, stately, and graceful figure, dark complexion, lustrous eyes, and so rich a voice that poor Elaine was and is not this a man "made to be loved"?

But all this perfection is marred—caused by one sin:

The great and guilty love he bare the Queen,
In battle with the love he bare his lord,
Had marred his face, and mark'd it ere his time.

For he does not rest considered in his sin, but fights against it manfully, so that, even when he is dead, he is "the one sole knight in the vanity of his nature—

Another slanting on rush heights with one
The tower of all the vast and all the world,
Had been the loftiest he for it; but in him
His mood was often like a fiend, and rose,
And drove him into wastes and solitudes
For agony, who was yet a living soul.

There was a great struggle in the noble man upon his perfection when he pointed out King Arthur to Lavaine—

Me you call great; mine is the firmer soul.
The truer knight; but I have to sway a youth

Now crescent, who will come to all I am
And overcome it; and in me there dwells
No greatness, save to be some far-off touch
Of greatness to know well I am not great:
There is the man.

But still his very truthfulness withheld him from breaking off the chain that bound him:—

His honour rooted in dishonour stood,
And faith unfaithful kept him falsely true.
Yet the great Knight in his mid sickness made
His battle broken music and poor movings
Theme, as but born of sickness, could not live.

His communing with himself, after the burial of Elaine, is very touching:—

For what am I? What pleasure can my name
Give any? or fame? I sought it not for it:
Pleasure to have it, none, to use it, none;
Now grown a part of me: but what use in is?
Can it be use in anything but making me worse?
Or sin seem less the sinner seeming great?
Nay, but for among mine own people, Knights,
Not after Arthur's heart! I needs must break
These bonds that tie me down to thankless shame.

Through this one sin, often repented of and striven against, but unabandoned, we have the dreadful downfall of his dear lord's cherished hopes, and the destruction of the purpose of his life. The whole round table was dissolved, and "unsolders all the goodliest fellowship of famous knights whereon this realm has based their glory."

Is there not a lesson here? And should we not thankfully acknowledge the greatest moral writing of the age as one of the highest order?

The accompanying Portrait of the Poet Laureate is from a photograph taken by Mr. Jeffrey, of Great Russell-street, published by Messrs Marion and Co., of Soho-square.

THE ALEXANDRA CASE.

The appeal in the Alexandra case came on for hearing in the Exchequer Chamber on Saturday last, before Sir Hugh Cairns, who appeared for the defendants, took exception at once to the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the appeal. After a long debate, the case was ordered to stand over until Monday. On that morning their Lordships delivered judgment. Being divided in opinion, the judgment of the Court below was consequently affirmed, and the point remains for the House of Lords.

Mr. Justice Mellor proceeded to give his decision in this important case. He said that, in consequence of the difference, his Lordship was of opinion that the Court had no jurisdiction to proceed in the matter.

Mr. Justice Blackburn said he had arrived at the same conclusion.

Mr. Justice Wilde differed from the decision of the two learned Judges who had just pronounced their opinion. He was the opinion that the Court had full power to deal with questions submitted to it.

Mr. Justice Blackburn said he had given the matter the best and most careful consideration to this important case, he was of opinion that the Court had no jurisdiction. Some cases had been cited in which it appeared that the Court of Exchequer Chamber was capable of deciding without a jury, but in the Court of Exchequer it was clear that Parliament should have delegated its functions to the Judges. The only question submitted to the Judges was whether there was sufficient evidence of the truth of the statement, and that further proceedings in the case should be stayed. He would, in effect, be committing to say that which it had not said and do that which it had not done. He regretted the necessity of differing from the learned Judge on the point in that Court; but, whatever had been the decision of their Lordships, he entertained no doubt that the matter would have been carried to the House of Lords, as the highest court of appellate jurisdiction; and, as it would now most certainly be brought before that tribunal, it was unnecessary for him to enter into the question. The motion for appeal was then dismissed.

Mr. Justice Willes said he had given his decision in favour of the application for the rule nisi, and he was sorry to find himself now stopping short. Much in the Court of Common Pleas, whilst the four of a contrary opinion—that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal—in the Court of Exchequer.

The Crown will, in all probability, appeal to the House of Lords against the decision of their Lordships in this case, and, should their Lordships think that the Court of Exchequer had power to frame the rule giving appeal, the argument in the Exchequer Chamber will then proceed.

"ESSAYS AND REVIEWS."—JUDGMENT.

After two years of anxious suspense the clergymen implicated in the production of the book called "Essays and Reviews" learnt the conclusion of their troubles on Saturday last, when the decision of the ecclesiastical judges of the Court of Appeal, the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. The two essays which contained the questionable matter were those of Dr. Rowland Williams and Mr. Wilson. Counsel for the latter, Mr. Bristowe, Q.C., and Mr. Archibald Stephens, were followed by Mr. Wickens. These two reverend gentlemen appealed against the decision of Sir John Dodson in the Arches Court.

The Lord Chancellor read judgment. After laying down certain rules of interpretation of a delegation from the Crown to a penal law, which we answer, but not the accused, to the passages set out in the articles of accusation, repealing the clause of the Act of Uniformity, the Court alleged took cognisance of the legal, not the doctrinal, question, his Lordship applied these strict tests to Dr. Williams's essay. He found that Dr. Williams in Article 2 of the charge to have maintained that the Bible is "an expression of devout research," "not the Word of God, but contains the Word of God," and "is truth." Dr. Williams does not say that the Bible is not the Word of God, but that it contains the Word of God, and is truth. "If the Hebrew Scriptures did not dwell in the Christian Church as the Word of God, and be the Canon, it followed that his words mean that the Bible was inspired by the Holy Spirit, which stands in the same relation to the sacred writers as inspiration. It is unfair to impose to a writer who admits this an opinion that "the Bible, an expression of devout research," is not the result of a supernatural power of men, and nothing more." With regard to the fifteenth charge against Dr. Williams, his words "the Mission of Christ" Baron Bramwell applied the accusation of not being a Christian." It would be a severe thing to treat language used in a sermon as a criminal charge, and to say that the use of it in it would be also unfair to take the words in a sense which they would not bear in any other place. Article 15 of the articles of religion is silent as to Christ's descent into hell, and so is the Bible. It is, therefore, not a derogation to speak of words by transfer as a "fiction," however unseemly that word may be. Dr. Williams's use of the word was unquestionably unseemly, and by the promoter as the true meaning of the 15th article. We are, therefore, of opinion that Dr. Rowland Williams did not contravene the law.

As to the two charges against Mr. Wilson, he is in the 8th article accused of saying, in effect, that the Bible is not the Word of God, whereas Wilson under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit; and that they were not necessary at all, certainly not to the whole Church." The promoter was bound to show that the Church of England had declared that the Bible was the Word of God, and that of the Scripture was written under inspiration in such a way that the Church articles or Homilies had declared it to be. The Court could not "fasten on things necessary" to salvation. The Court could not "fasten on things necessary" to salvation. The Court could not "fasten on things necessary" to salvation

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Studies from the Antique and Sketches from Nature. By Charles Mackay. (1 vol. Virtue Brothers and Co.) The author, to a considerable extent, precludes criticism if he really hold to the theory which he enunciates by the mouth of Apollo in these words :—

> Who judges poets should himself have won
> The garland and the crown ;

for few of those who venture to criticise poems have arrived at the laureate dignity. However, as he himself incidentally contradicts himself when he says that the unsuccessful crowd as applauding Apollo and laughing at Marsyas (thereby showing the correctness of their judgment), perhaps one of the uncrowned may venture, without offence, to express general admiration for these studies and sketches. If varied fancy and exactness of expression ; if manual skill in rhetoric and musical rhythm ; if spirit, geniality, and tenderness count for anything in an assemblage of poetry, good store of these will be found to be found in this volume. The author's treatment of the ancient mythology may be considered as unobjective, or at any rate inconsistent with what was whipped into them at school ; but this is a matter of very small importance. Neither is the especially effusive mood affected by what a hypercritical mood, perhaps, found fault with in the following passage :—

> Richer comes humbled Wealth,
> Scaping the curse of Midas,
> Which Fate, ille prud Iaventus, also mid the stars and deeded.

For, if the Scriptures may be taken as any authority, it was a "drop" which was begged by Dives that "poor Lazarus" might "with the quite as intelligible and poetical as "crumbs of Health") ; nor is the heaven-seated beggar particularly afflicted with pride, inasmuch as Father Abraham spoke for him, and alleged, amongst other reasons for his non-compliance with the request, the "great impassability of the gulf ; so that the simile loses whatever merit it would possess, even were it appropriate. And never in a few lines have witness to his easy swing, and simple pathos, and kindly spirit, for which the author is most entitled.

> Were I far more bright
> Than the heavenly light,
> More pure than fire or air,
> Where the glaziers grow,
> And were I clothed with child,
> Dead and forlorn,
> In the cold earth,
> I would not pine
> The right to disdain,
> Or to stand up
> From my brother's hurt,
> Even my foe
> From a sinner's place,
> Or berate one sad lack or scorn
> To the meanest wretch that ever was born.

To what category of poetry are we to assign these ? We cannot know ; we decline to grant him the dignity, the stateliness, the sublimity of an epic ; we will not be content with Horace's modest acknowledgment.

> Quod si me Lyricis vatibus inseres,
> Sublimi ferum vertice sidera,

he is—and has long been—entitled to knock his head against the stars.

The Story of the Guns. By Sir James Emerson Tennent. (1 vol. Longmans.) In a very unfortunate year, for it shows him upwards of two millions of the public money have been expended in experiments which have as yet failed to produce himself one weapon. And, since Sir Emerson Tennent's book was published, we believe we are correct in saying that the "Horsley gun" has added a fresh complication to the question of impenetrable armour. The volume has evidently been compiled with great care and interest in the subject from all the best sources, and it will be pretty sure to command the serious attention of all to whom guns and armed ships are interesting. It is, in fact, the history of the Navy of England, as regarding "Brown Bess" to the present time, accompanied by numerous illustrations.

Life Portraits of Shakspeare. By J. Hain Friswell. (1 vol. Sampson Low, Son, and Marston.) Every student of Shakspeare must exact their shadows before, are occasionally preceded by avant coriers of more solid worth. Thus the impression produced by the many portraits of Shakspeare has its forerunner in the shape of an elegant volume (dedicated to the Swan Shakespeare Committee) wherein the pamphlet is toned, the type excellent, the photography by Messrs. Cothill, Downes, and Co., and the letterpress by the author of this work, J. Hain Friswell. The written part of the book has for its object to weigh the claims to originality of many busts and pictures of Shakspeare, few of which only it has seemed good to reproduce by the aid of photography upon the pages of the volume. We do not feel competent to pronounce any opinion upon the originality of any one bust or portrait from the Stratford bust, which requires a fleshy, unintellectual appearance, to the mingled expression of surprise and self-complacency such as might have been worn by the famous Bottom after exploration within the interior of a mince-pie, down to the portrait by Cornelius Jansen, which is that (photographed in the book) which we like best ; what is far better, we can quote the conclusion at which Mr. Friswell has arrived. "We say, therefore, that, from the contemporary evidence carefully, and taking into consideration the probabilities of the case, assume that the most authentic representation of the poet is that of the head inserted in the folio edition of 1623, and that we may take it, together with the bust at Stratford-on Avon, as a test of the genuineness of the many other assumed portraits of the poet." Whether Mr. Friswell be right or not let others determine ; it shall not be our part to cavil for the present at the loyal loving spirit with which he appears to have performed his task. It is to be regretted, however, that in the case of Shakspeare he pronounces to be "good Latin hexameters and pentameters," some evil influence (in the shape of compositors or reader) prevented the author from be able to render both the construction and the scansion more than we can (according to our English light) recommend. Perhaps the printers will be more fortunate, or more learned, and be able to deal comfortably with this cripple :—

> Vo mihi ; pro tanto munera sana dabo !
> Quæ quoniam vester non possit habere, tuorum
> Sed tibi vobis tuleris omnia, quæ dabitur.
> Clarus ubi nimium fuerit, tuus ille videbit.

As it stands it is an unintelligible, indecent jumble.

Golden Words. (1 vol. J. H. and J. Parker.) It is comforting to find that amidst all the bustle and hurry of the present age of Vanity Fair even a layman can find sufficient leisure to employ his mind upon higher things. It is consolatory to find that unpretentious literature is in the ascendant, yet the wants of those who hunger and thirst after something better, something more enduring, something more cheering, something holier, are not altogether neglected ; and that to the multitudes to those wants is a layman, who, we have no doubt, that the minister must go back two, three, and four centuries in his search for the mingled eloquence and piety which are so refreshing to the inner soul. Only a few years ago, and we find in these latter days the gift of language and the power of touching the heart are not always found combined with the gift of knowledge of the Divinity or with the office of preacher. Sermons, nowadays, both spoken and written, are for the most part composed of commonplaces and modern prayers are, for the most part, soulless effusions. The compiler of this volume has, therefore, done good service in these words" from the "works of Divines of part of the fifteenth and of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries" and has prefixed to his compilation short biographies of the principal utterers of the "golden words." A volume has thus been provided for the hundred and forty and four thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal and given themselves over entirely to Mammon, which is replete and exhortation, and admonition, and comfort, conveyed in language unpolled either by pedantry or by pretentiousness.

The Illustrated Horse Management. By Edward Mayhew, M.R.C.V.S. (1 vol. W. H. Allen and Co.) The idea of managing stables upon Christian principles may raise a smile with some, but we regard it as a fool will regress that smile upon consideration, or, at any rate, upon reflection. Mr. Mayhew's book, which advocates the treatment of our much-abused friend and servant, the horse, upon principles of universal benevolence, which is synonymous, to a certain extent, with Christianity. Let all who take any interest in the horse read Mr. Mayhew's remarks upon everything connected with the glorious creature, ie eluding anatomy, medicine, shoeing, teeth, food, vices, stables, grooms, shoes, breeding, exercise, and treatment. The illustrations, which are the four hundred engravings which accompany them ; and, whilst they groan at the ignorance, carelessness, and ill-temper which more continually one of God's best gifts, they will, as any rate, learn a lesson for the future. We have regard to the often-repeated, often-contradicted assertion about the natural vice of a horse, the following observation of Mr. Mayhew will not be out of place :—

"The horse possesses a full-sized liver ; still, the gland exhibits no propensity to which any excess of bile secretion may be retained. The testimony of Nature associates the creatures which man views as opposites, or regards as the emblem of peace and as the living embodiment of warfare, the dove or pigeon ; it has no gall ; and the dove or pigeon ; it has "a liver which exhibits no gall-bladder," and this fact is in full accordance with their gentle and inoffensive of disposition." We ought, therefore, for a similar reason, to believe that no horse is naturally vicious. How the horse is made vicious may be discovered by reading Mr. Mayhew's highly entertaining book.

MUSIC.

AT the MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS of this week the music was selected with unusual care. Of the Sonata of BEETHOVEN the announcement said :—"Wednesday, Feb. 3, being the anniversary of the birth of Felix MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY, the director of the Monday Popular Concerts believed that the 142nd concert (the next immediately following that date) would most appropriately, and most in consonance with the wishes of his patrons, be devoted to the works of that illustrious master." The instrumental portion of the programme included the Sonata in C minor, for piano, Op. 12 ; the sonata last quintet ; the trio in C minor, for the piano, violin, and violoncello ; one of the quartets for stringed instruments, and the Septet, Op. 20, of Beethoven. The vocal music was selected from the Lieder, Op. 71 and 84, and several choice songs. Mr. Charles HALLE presided at the pianoforte, the principal violin, Miss Banks and Mr. Sainsbury the singers. We need scarcely add that the entire entertainment was received with enthusiasm by a crowded audience.

Macfarren's new opera, "Sir Stoops to Conquer" founded on Goldsmith's well-known comedy of the same name, will be produced at the ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA, Covent-garden. Of this work and its performance more will be said hereafter.

The second concert of Mr. HENRY LESLIE'S Choir took place on Thursday last week at St. James's Hall. Its principal features were the performance of a new madrigal, "O come at last" Samuel Wesley's motet for a double choir, "In exitu Israel ; and Mr. Leslie's setting of the 130th Psalm, "De Profundis Clamavi." The remainder of the programme was made up of a judicious selection of madrigals, glees, and part songs. The concert was most deservedly excellent, and warmly applauded by a large audience.

We observed in the Times of Monday that a new performance of "Faust" at Her Majesty's Theatre, on Monday next, the 15th inst. Morning dramatic performances are coming much into vogue at various theatres, and with very much success. It is pleasant to see members of families to enjoy entertainments which they are quite incapable of witnessing at night. Consequently, we hope that the most popular opera will, of course, thus performed, draw an overflowing house.

MRS. MERESET, so well known and highly distinguished in the musical world as Miss M. B. Raven, is about to open a class of elementary singing. A more useful, and at the same experience eminently qualify her for success in such an undertaking.

At the annual general meeting of the ROYAL MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON on Wednesday, the 3rd inst., the following professional gentlemen were elected honorary members :—Messrs. Auber, Balfe, J. T. Carodus, Ciprissi, Potter, Schira, and Harold Thomas. Six non-professionals were also elected honorary members, including Dr. James Parker Deane, Q. C., and the Earl of Dunraven.

The "Barbiere di Siviglia" has been produced at the THEATRE ITALIEN in Paris, with Mdlle. Patti and Signor Delle Sedie as Patti as Rosina. Mario sang as in his best days, and looked and acted the character to the life. Of Mdlle. Patti's Rosina, and the captivating young prima donna was as captivating as ever. They were received with enthusiasm by the most brilliant house of the season.

There have been disputes about Mdlle. Patti's age, but the question has been set at rest by the publication of the extract from the baptismal register of the church of St. Louis, in Madrid, from which it appears that she was born on the 19th of February, 1843, and baptised on the 8th of April following. When she made her début at Covent Garden, barely seven years ago, therefore, she was under eighteen, and is now one and twenty.

The famous GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS of Leipsic maintain their reputa- tion as at present the most celebrated in all concerts in Germany. The programme of the last concert included the following pieces :—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven ; Recitative and air from "Don Giovanni," sung by Mdlle. Orgeni ; the first movement of the Violin Concerto in D minor, played by Herr August Wilhelm ; scena from "Norma," sung by Mdme. von Polnitz, Herr Beitz ; overture to "Genoveva," Schumann ; a symphony by Herr Otto Singer, of Dresden ; and Schumann's symphony in C major.

Gounod's "Faust" has been produced with great eclat at New York by the Parepa-Rosa company, under the direction of Herr Anschütz. At the second concert of the New York Philharmonic Society, the following pieces were performed :—Beethoven's symphony and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." Wagner's music, it would seem, is performed more frequently in America than here.

PROFESSOR SCHINDLER, the well-known friend and biographer of Beethoven, died on the 16th of January at Bockenheim, where he had lived for many years in retirement. He has left behind Beethoven's posthumous papers, which he ceded to the Prussian Government for the Berlin Museum, in consideration of an annuity.

NEW ENTERTAINMENTS.

EGYPTIAN HALL.—Mr. Maskelyne has opened again with Mr. Arthur Sketchley, whose reputation has gradually increased, and who now appears to have established for himself a permanent home. He may now be found every evening at 8 p.m. in Mitchell's, the room once tenanted by Mr. Albert Smith, where now, instead of a lecture on Mont Blanc, we have lectures on Mrs. Brown. Mr. Sketchley possesses not a few of the characteristics of the late Mr. A. Smith, and is in all points as unlike him as he can be. He has the attention of the public. The lectures is illustrated with panoramic views, which have been painted by Mr. Maskelyne, jun., and which very ably illustrated the excellence of Grieve, Beverley, and Telbin, with whom we understand he was formerly associated. The views, however, are so successful (that of the Boulevard Sebastopol, for instance) that the audience are ready to exclaim that they do not require the accompaniment. Another very effective scene was that of Notre Dame, with the procession of the Host and the ringing of the bells. The interior of the café, including its various groups, was admirably painted. Mr. Sketchley, in the manner of his predecessor, introduces personal sketches of character which are exceedingly amusing, and which, with the social satire they imply, are decidedly piquant. Then comes the immortal story of Mrs. Brown at the play, which tells amusingly, notwithstanding that the public must now be most familiar with it. Mr. Sketchley has considerable vein of humour throughout his delivery, and keeps his audience in an excited state of laughter to the end of the entertainment.

GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION.—Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, with Mr. John Parry, have commenced their regular season with an new entertainment, entitled "Love in Light," which is the best, and for which they have engaged the talents of Mr. Tolbin, who has bestowed on the subject a prodigality of embellishments. The libretto has been prepared by the clever pen of Mr. Shirley Brooks. The character of this work is somewhat superior to the general run of the facetiæ of the kind, and not only aims at instruction as well as amusement, but presupposes a certain amount of knowledge in the audience. We trust that the example thus laudably set will be followed, and that the experiment, hazardous as it is, may prove successful. The entertainment is characterised in the announcement as "Anglo-Egyptian," and entitled "The Pyramids ; or, Progress in the South." The views are mainly stereoscopic, and some of them very striking—such as the Great Pyramid, the Sphinx, the Temple of Karnac, and the atmospheric effects peculiar to the locality. The series of scenes begins with Alexandria, after him the trio of entertainers find themselves in a soup apartment in the house of a Consul, where they amuse themselves with a culinary dispute preparatory to their departure for the tombs. The impressions of character, though somewhat subtle and arbitrary, are very effective, and Mr. Parry is quite at home in her element in the part of the Irish lady, Miss Rose O'Grady. The make-ups both of this lady and Mr. Reed are highly elaborate and successful, and much assist in the interpretation of the author's ideas to the audience. The songs introduced are capital, Mr. Parry is likewise excellent in his assumptions. There is also a canine performer that deserves a word of encouragement. The holiday that is the occasion of the visit of the Honourable Dudgeon Spangladore has been well taught, and does credit to his training.

The correspondence between England and France relative to a Congress of European Powers has been published in the form of a Parliamentary paper. It consists chiefly of letters from the Emperor of the French to the Queen and her Majesty's reply, also communications which passed between Mr. Bourke in Paris and Lord Cowley and Earl Russell. The object of the proposition is known.

The postage on open letters for Nicaragua will be increased from the 1st of March next from 6d. to 1s. the single rate (half an ounce), the scale of progression being increased proportionately by substituting for the existing scale a scale of weight, having half an ounce as a unit throughout, with the postage advancing consecutively by 1s. for each half ounce. Thus, a letter weighing more than half an ounce and not more than one ounce will be 2s., a letter 12s. not not exceeding 3 oz., 4s ; for every additional 4 oz., 1s. The postage on open letters for Nicaragua must be paid in advance or they cannot be forwarded.

WUZBEES CROSSING THE INDUS ON WATER-JARS.

THE readiness shown by the natives of India in making the most of the means at their disposal is quite a national characteristic, and is exemplified in the engraving by the means which they have engraved on page 168. A party of Wuzbees are crossing the river Indus leaning on their water-jars, and using sufficiently to keep their matchlocks and ammunition dry, while with their hands they paddle themselves across the stream in the same way as we see natives forepaws in swimming. By this means a large number can effect the passage of a river in safety ; many dangers have to be met on the march, for eather water-pots being in universal use are easily procured at the halting-places. The Wuzbees are one of the tribes of fanatics on the borders of the Punjaub. They are a set of half wild robbers, plundering and living by plunder. Having in bands intruded their marauding propensities across our frontier, they have, as already stated, rendered a lesson which will serve to check them for some time to come.

RETURNING FROM THE RACES.

OUR last Number contained Illustrations (from sketches by Mr. Frederick George, of Cairo) of a truly English sport held under most un-English circumstances—a steeplechase recently held in desert near Cairo ; and we now complement them by another Engraving from a sketch by the same gentleman, of the Viceroy returning from the Races, under an equally novel aspect. This scene, depicted on the next page, differs essentially, in the matters of detail, from a similar one in the Champs Elysées or Ascot. The hills in the distance are known as the Mokattem. At the end of the road appears the distinguished Arab cavalcade, with its grand escort, the most striking feature in the panorama of Cairo. The point from the midstfield, broken into long streams, are making their way. Conspicuous amongst all in this motley assemblage is the glittering cavalcade of his Highness the Viceroy, which is dashing onwards to Cairo. Ismail Pacha reclines in a handsome barouche, drawn by four English horses, richly caparisoned. Behind his carriage two more horses occupy the rumble. The escort is composed of picked men, who in their splendid costumes look like a host opposing opponents. By the Prince's carriage ride the aide-de-camp and a few superior officers. In the distance may be seen a carriage and pair of the same, the unfortunate occupants having in some cases to leave their equipages and join the pedestrians.

Leaves from a Sketch-Book.

We propose to present to our readers, at intervals, a series of sketches taken from time to time during an extensive course of travel at home and abroad. They are what they profess to be, "Leaves from a Sketch-book." Whether sauntering through the historic streets of Continental cities or strolling through the quiet lanes of England—which, after all the travelling in the world, are found to yield the tenderest scenes, because they are redolent of home—wherever in man's work, the town, or God's work, the country, we were attracted by aught of the picturesque, there our sketch-book was called forth to fix that which otherwise might have made but a transient impression, and to revive, as often as we might turn over its leaves, the memories of those pleasant days. Not often in the great towns of the Continent does a sketcher attract any attention; though occasionally some guardian of order would look over our shoulders with a vague idea that we might possibly be making plans, on hostile views intent; and once or twice, in the narrow streets of Toledo, have we felt that an eye was upon us; and, looking round with a half expectation of seeing some olive-hued bandit, with slouched sombrero and glittering specimen of his native manufactures, glaring upon us, have caught, instead, the retreating glance of such "roguish sparklers" as Isaac Mendora would fain have seen, and such as Philip of Spain (not that very uncomfortable and unloving spouse of that most uncomfortable and unlovable Queen Mary, but our own jobber of that ilk) has so often portrayed. And when, in our rambles through the south of England, we have been endeavouring to transfer to our book a sketch of some quiet English scene, remote as yet from the fuzzing, and steaming, and grilling of the huge gridiron that seems so necessary to the establishment of the giant Commerce, we have been horrified to hear, in the broadest of dialects, from not the narrowest of mouths (that which our pen, of course, like Prince Gortschakoff's, is too sharply cut to imitate), a rustic suspicion that we were planning a new "line." Not so, honest Hodge. We would not willingly disturb or remove one sod of that green sward of yours, though presented for the purpose with silver spade or mahogany barrow. And yet there is a something which whispers to us that it may be well for you and for your children after you that your steps should be taught a faster to everything, were not as yet, but a good, simple, jog-trot life suffered them, except perchance when mounted on that summit of human dignity and ambition, the box-seat of the Highflyer or Wonder of those days, as it rattled along the broad turnpike at the bewildering rate of ten miles an hour! Gone are the glorious whips of old—glorious in men if not in mind, as Longfellow hath it—great beings then—the adored of the fair sex, the envy of their own—who so loftily condescended to take the timidly proffered half-crown with an air that made the giver bankrupt in gratitude and humbled to the dust with self-abasement!

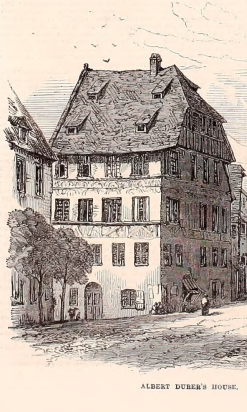
pace in this whirligig world of ours; and that even those calm retreats might not send in a lesser tale to the harvest of human good, if their long fallow were broken up by the action of the great steam-plough. Still, we pin our love, if not our faith, upon all that is quaint and unchanged, and can give no grudging sympathy to the laudatores temporis acti, who lived in the pre-scientific period, when telegraphs and photographs, railroads to everywhere and Royal roads



ALBERT DURER'S TOMB.

If any of our readers have thus a sneaking kindness for the past, and are half inclined to look upon the present as an uncalled-for intrusion, let us beg them to seat themselves upon our wishing-carpet, and drop down into the Old-world city of Nuremberg, because it is rich in everything of the past, and owns nothing of the present. A contemporary the other day paid it an unexpected compliment by informing its readers that "The German race is in advance of the British in one respect—it has a Nuremberg!" The reason assigned for this pre-eminence was that "it can express grotesque ideas in wood and leather, and can relate, in maple and glue, the anonymous history of Reynard the Fox." The object of the writer was to point a graver moral than the words appear to convey; and yet it is something to boast of that this city supplies to the babyhood and childhood of half the globe those "Dutch" toys which charm the infant mind at the same time that they afford a vent for those destructive propensities which might otherwise be employed in "tearing each other's eyes." One is said to have wished only to write the ballads of a people in order to rule them. What unsuspected influence may the makers of its children's toys have upon the future tendencies of a nation? Girls of all times, ancient and modern, have instinctively nursed their dolls, and any boy will scatter his Noah's ark to the winds if he may shoulder his wooden musket and beat his mimic drum. But children of a larger growth are not forgotten. It is said that all the foil used for giving a factitious depth and lustre to jewellery is made at Nuremberg. It has something more substantial to rest upon than this. Little more than a century has elapsed since it successfully vied with Berlin and Vienna in the magnificence of its buildings and surpassed them in the wealth and enterprise of its inhabitants. Though it cannot, like Marseilles, boast of a classic existence, yet we find that it very soon became a place of mark, and as early as 1187 was made an Imperial city by the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa. The Nuremburgers gave early evidence of a commercial turn by a notable bargain they made with the profligate Charles IV., from whom they obtained many valuable privileges in exchange for four cartloads of Rhenish wine. They also, a century later, bought out Frederick, Elector of Brandenburg, an ancestor of the present Royal house of Prussia, to whom, as Burgraves of their city, they owed allegiance. These Burgraves, who inhabited a castle within the city-walls, received their appointment from the Emperors, and were supposed to act as protectors of Nuremberg; but the good citizens, who had now become free traders, determined to have no more to do with such protection, and, on Frederick's retirement, levelled his castle with the ground. They offered no violence, however, to the Reichsfeste, or Imperial castle, which remains still a conspicuous and commanding object to the north of the city. It long was a favourite residence of the German Emperors when Nuremberg was of importance in the councils of Europe. It is so no longer. After playing a prominent part in the establishment of the Reformation and in the Thirty Years' War, it gradually declined until, in 1806, by the Act of the Confederation of the Rhine, it was incorporated with Bavaria. But, though its palmy days are gone, yet the city remains the same in all its external features. It is a wonderful instance of suspended animation. One might almost fancy that under a night and that under day it would wake up from its long trance, and, as Tennyson sings,

Dash downward in a cataract.

To find oneself there is to be thrown back 200 or 400 years, for it is a purely mediæval city, surrounded by a wide ditch and feudal walls, the latter surmounted, as in our Sketches, by square and round towers, which are said to have been originally built in 1000. We recently spoke of a generation long passed away. Here the eye rests on some gorgeous oriel of the most exquisite design, with its rich tracery, its ever the high-pitched roofs, with story on story of pointed dormers, here, again, some richly carved overhanging gable, which leads to the eaves and rising high above them with its delicate spire. Through the middle of the city, from east to west, flows the Pegnitz, forming, dividing it into two districts, named respectively from the churches of St. Sebaldus and St. Lawrence. The former is considered sacred for its eastern choir, built in genuine Gothic and adorned with beautiful columns. Here, in the centre, is the high shrine of the patron saint, which was cast by Peter Vischer and his five sons, and is justly considered one of the finest works in Germany. This, with the celebrated bronze figures of Christ outside the west door, the richly-carved door by Adam Krafft, the bronze font in which the Emperor Wenceslaus was baptized, the antique and highly-wrought candelabra, and also the Church of St. Sebaldus not merely an object to "do" in a scrambling visit, but to be lingered on with delight, and to leave an impression not easily effaced. Still finer, however, is the Church of St. Lawrence, with its noble towers or contrivel that its magnificent east expressed the grilicon on which that saint vindicated the faith. On entering by the magnificent portal between the two lofty shrines of the patron saints, the canning handicraft of these workers in bronze, stone, and wood, who have given so much a fame to Nuremberg, shows itself at once, and before another great work of Adam Krafft—the Sacramentshaeuslein, a marvellous specimen of stone carving, which, like some elegant structure, rises to the very roof of the church, and is wrought with delicate way. Although the religion of Nuremberg is Lutheran, the altar is surrounded by richly-ornamented shrines, and the "holy

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE DUCHESS DOWAGER OF PARMA.

Her Royal Highness, Louise-Marie-Therese d'Artois de Bourbon, Duchess Dowager of Parma, Piacenza, and the Guastalla, died at Venice on the 1st inst. The august lady was, indeed, the daughter of misfortune. She was born on the 9th of July, 1819, the calamity Princess Elizabeth—to whom was subsequently added the second sister also of Louis XVIII., her very birth alike the restoration of that Monarch was, in some measure, a disappointment, as it delivered the hope of a male heir to the Bourbon throne of France. She was but a few months old when her father, the Duke of Berry, was assassinated. His was a sad fate. He had not, indeed, any family reason to love France by the Revolution of 1830. He was but ten years married when his consort, Duke Charles, fell by the dagger of an assassin, and the widow of the Bourbon Princes to be an exile. In Rome, herself almost perpetually exiled, with her father and brother, she remained until the death, in 1836, of the latter, who had experienced banishment or slaughter, like Princesses of the world. Her Royal Highness was the only daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Berry. Her brother, by his consort, Caroline (the celebrated Duchess of Berry) the daughter of Francesco I., King of the Two Sicilies, and granddaughter of Charles X., King of France and Navarre, and sister of the present Henri de Bourbon, Count de Chambord, was born on the 29th of Sept., 1820, and became, the Duke of Berry, was associated in Paris by Lovel, as the Opera House door, Feb. 14, 1820. The Princess, who inherited the beauty of her mother, Charles X., was married, Nov. 10, 1845, to Charles III., of Bourbon, Duke of Parma, who succeeded to the duchy on the abdication of his father, Charles Louis, thereby annexed, on the abdication of his father, Charles Louis, thereby annexed, on the abdication of his father, Charles Louis, thereby annexed,

No. 1246.—VOL. XLIV. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1864. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE ESTIMATES FOR THE YEAR.

It is probable that certain gigantic pamphlets, containing on all their pages symmetrical rows of figures, and which in official language are known as "Estimates," very seldom come into the hands of extra-Parliamentary personages. At least, it is only those who from business motives take them up who study their contents and ponder upon their suggestiveness. It is, however, in these documents that the British taxpayer may read and learn something, if not everything, of the mode by which that vast sum total which is called the revenue is appropriated. Indeed, apart from the mere financial interest, there is a good deal in the Estimates which is as nearly as possible amusing, and there are items of expenditure to be found there set down which show how wide are the ramifications of the influence and the power of England, and through how many streams, large and small, some of them dwindling down into the minutest of rills, the public money of this country flows. It is at this period of the Session that the two principal Estimates—those for the Army and Navy—are presented to Parliament; while a little later the third and last—that for the Civil Service—makes its appearance. Accordingly, the two former have already been laid before the House of Commons, and those for the Navy stand for discussion on Monday next.

In considering the Estimates, the first idea that occurs to the intending student of their long-drawn-out details has reference to their amount, and the member of Parliament who is in full and earnest sympathy with the taxpayer eagerly makes a comparison between those of the present and those of the past year in the hope of finding a diminution, a circumstance, supposing it to arise, that is always made to answer the purpose of unlimited official glorification, and which is sure to be criticised to the verge of sneering by cold-hearted and exigent financial reformers. In truth, we are not sure whether a comparatively small decrease in the Estimates is not calculated to bring a great deal more teasing upon the heads of departments in the house than if they had boldly stuck to the figures of the previous year. The amateur reducers of public expenditure pounce upon the implied admission that there is room for decrease, and are apt to taunt the responsible Minister with want of zeal or want of ability to do more in that direction. In their hearts, however, they know from experience the real difficulties of the case, and are really glad to accept, without acknowledging, such small mercies as are vouchsafed to them as some tribute to the principles which they profess. In the present year, unless a great change has come over the spirits of the Parliamentary critics to whom we allude, there is every likelihood that there will be a considerable discharge of crimination on the heads of the departments of the Admiralty and of War; for, whereas last year both the Army and Navy Estimates showed a decrease of a million, which is worth talking about, this year there is an actual diminution in the entire aggregate of only half a million. That is, the Army Estimates last year amounted to £15,060,237, while this year the charge is £14,884,888. In 1863 the calculated expenditure for the Navy was £10,736,032, and that for 1864 is set down at £10,432,616. The difference on the whole, as we have said, is about half a million.

The question which will next week be repeatedly asked on behalf of the pensive, but nowadays really patient, taxpayer, is, whether this decrease, small as it is, is satisfactory? We think that, on a fair and proper consideration of the circumstances of the moment, the general opinion will be that even so moderate a cutting down of the national pecuniary obligations is not without its merit. Given the proposition that the public which pays the taxes is unwilling that the efficiency of our land and sea forces should be impaired, but desires rather that they should be strengthened and consolidated, the question of the reduction of the men and matériel of the two services is at once disposed of. It is not, we believe, asserted by any one, except that small body of political economists who are known as the peace-at-any-price party, that we have more troops than are necessary for our foreign, or rather our colonial, service, and for the keeping up of a respectable and presentable reserve at home; while the fact that we have reached to about the first stage in the necessary reconstruction of our Navy is undeniable. While artillery and the whole science of gunnery are in a state of transition, and when it is admitted by the First Lord of the Admiralty that our Navy is at present, and without broadside pieces of ordnance adequate to the supposed requirements of modern warfare, a considerable source of warlike expenditure must continue to exist. In short, it is to be feared that the general question of a reduction of armaments must be left to its solution in that halcyon period when, science having completed and multiplied weapons of destruction up to such a point that mere human bodies, even when massed in battalions which are to be counted by hundreds of thousands, are unable to stand before the whirlwind of shot and shell, of iron and steel, and chemical flame, the discovery is made that war, as the ultimate arbitration of national quarrels, is an impossibility, as it had long been an absurdity.

But when dealing with the subject of reduction of Estimates there is another consideration involved besides the nader, or rather the simple process of shifting the load from one shoulder and ships. Of course nothing is easier than to cut off from the lists so many men, soldiers or sailors, each of whom stands involuntarily accountant for the expenditure of a specific sum of money; and by placing so many ships of war out of commission, the result is the disappearance of a charge of so many hundreds of thousands of pounds. There are those, however, who do not advocate the reduction of naval and military armaments at the cost of efficiency or the peril of national honour and safety, who hold, and who give excellent reasons for their opinion, that money might be largely saved in a better system of administration, and by a more judicious spending of the vast sums which Parliament annually commits to the custody of the public departments. So far as the Navy is concerned this theory, if it deserve the name, has been practically put to the test, and has been acknowledged by the officials of the Admiralty. Last year there was added to that Board a gentleman whose Parliamentary career, short as it had been, was marked by precise and definite attempts to establish the principle that every public department might be introduced into our naval and military establishments, and this consistently with even greater efficiency than at present exists in both departments. The Prime Minister, no doubt struck with the cogency of his arguments, and assuming that the result of so much apparent study of the principles on which such an administrative reform could be established, took the gentleman to whom allusion is made, appointed him what is called Civil Lord of the Admiralty—that is, the member of the Board under whose especial supervision the expenditure of the department comes. It is hardly to be supposed that a gentleman, who as a member of Parliament has always borne a high reputation, founded on an adequate basis for public spirit, for sympathy with the people in the broadest sense of the term, and for complete independence as a politician, would have accepted the Government without stipulating for sufficient freedom of action in the discharge of his functions as would enable him to carry out with due care and caution the principles which he had so efficiently laid down in all the speeches which accompanies eloquence and force of character. Accordingly, it soon became known that the new Civil Lord of the Admiralty was sedulously employed in a rigid and scrupulous investigation of the subject which would afford abundant scope for Parliamentary animadversion—namely, what should be called, in a word, the dockyard system; and shortly before the meeting of Parliament it was, if not exactly announced, allowed to ooze out that the labours of this gentleman were being keenly attended with favourable results; and it is, we believe, to those labours that a decrease of £300,000 in the Naval Estimates for the present year is mainly if not altogether owing. It is true that there is a reduction in the number of seamen and marines from 75,000 to 71,000; but, as this stands only for an item of £47,000, it cannot be counted as a sensible detraction from official merit, as represented by the Junior Lord of the Admiralty. A saving of £300,000, however, in connection with some ten millions and a half of naval expenditure, does not sound very magnificent when spoken or look very imposing when written; but it becomes important when, on examination, the mode in which it is effected appears. We do not propose here to go into details, but it may suffice to say that in this reduction an intelligible principle has been adopted and a practical method of working it out has been discovered, which is capable of very satisfactory extension.

Although the War Department has not put forward, and, as it were, presented to the public eye a palpable administrative reformer, and given him a name by which he may be praised, yet we are happy to say that it will be found that the principle of judicious reduction, applied in detail, is patent in the Army Estimates also. The decrease is, in fact, more equally distributed than that of the Navy, and it is to be hoped that the principle of economy has been more judiciously applied. The actual decrease here is also not capable of being specially vaunted, if you take the exact money saving as the test of laudation; but we must repeat that it is a subject of much attention to see that at least the seed of careful administration has been sown, and that a first, if not a very plentiful, return has already been reaped in both of those great departments which count for the greatest part of our heavy—still too heavy—national expenditure.

Although, as we have shown, the Army and Navy Estimates exhibit a decrease of not more than half a million, and therefore cannot be taken for much in reference to the important question of what may be our prospects of lightened taxation in the coming financial year, one thing seems to be broad and clear—namely, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has at his disposal a surplus rated at quite three millions. Five or six weeks will intervene ere, in accordance with custom, the Minister of Finance makes his annual declaration of the state of his affairs. It is possible that within that time the European complications which must necessarily cause the Budget to be as yet in supposition may have passed away; but at any rate the policy of England in relation to the Danish question must be declared. If, as is to be hoped, that policy will be one which will make no calls on the exchequer of this country, we shall have Mr. Gladstone, of a surety, pursuing that course of reduction of taxation which it has been his happy fortune in the last two or three years to adopt. In that case we may hope for a penny in the pound off the income tax, a reduction in the sugar duties, a natural sequence to last year's reduction on tea, and to the tea duty, amongst other minor matters, the duty on fire insurance will disappear. Of course, a Chancellor of the Exchequer who is in a position to make these being a financier will embellish his Budget with some of those favourite financial, those substitutions and resubstitutions in which he delights, and which enable him to elaborate and render more interesting that great oration, to which so many members listen eagerly later and which millions is eagerly read. But, if no international shock should arise to dislocate the smoothness and compactness of the pleasant reality of a disposable surplus of three millions, the palpable and tangible fact of a considerable reduction of taxation will remain as the great, the happiest feature of the Budget of 1864.

FRANCE.

The legal papers of Paris state that an action has been issued by the Chambre de Mines en Accroissement, against the crew of the Emanuel and four Italians before the Court of Assizes of the Department of the Seine, on the charge of conspiracy against the Count de Persigny. The case will probably come on for hearing on the 25th inst.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says:—I understand it has been found necessary to have the Imperial Guard in readiness to march towards the frontier at the shortest notice, in case only as a measure of precaution."

A decree has been issued convoking the electors of the seventh circumscription of the department du Nord, to elect a Deputy on the 6th and 7th of March.

A banquet took place in Paris on Thursday week, to celebrate the progress thus far of the Isthmus of Suez Canal project. About 1500 guests were present. M. de Lesseps, the author of the plan, and Prince Napoleon presided, and traced the history of the enterprise from its commencement. Among the guests were Lord Hobart Caradoc, M. de Lesseps and M. Dupin were among the other speakers.

M. Michel Chevalier has published a pamphlet on the Annexations, and final acquittal by the Court of Douai, after fourteen or fifteen months' imprisonment, of the persons implicated in it. It is to be hoped enough to at last obtain what had been so long refused him—put mission to go to Rome to see the Pope. The object of the mission, it consisted of 1500 persons, and the person who acted as secretary on the occasion was one of the staff of the Constitutionnel, in which the proceedings have been published. M. Michel was the chief administrator of the affairs of the association which he founded, and the transactions of which are now brought before us. For many years past, M. Michel is said to contemplate other financial schemes of importance, and with the view of their being successful, the Emperor, it is said, is the shouts of "Vive l'Empereur! Vive Marie!"

M. Emmanuel Arago, the Mayor of Paris, is indefatigable in his endeavours to supply the inhabitants of Paris with pure water. The Museum d'Artillerie, which is one of the finest collections in the world, is bered in Paris—see at the Buttes aux Cailles, in the thirteenth arrondissement, on the left bank of the Seine, in the other at La Chapelle, in the eighteenth. The boring of these wells is to be carried well with a view to ascertain, in order that the new public garden about to be opened at the Buttes aux Cailles may be supplied with water. The new water-machines erected at the Quai d'Austerlitz raise 22,000 cubic metres of water for every twenty-four hours. The municipal Council are unceasing in pressing forward the works for conveying the water from the Vanne and Dhuis. The Vanne will yield 100 cubic yards of water from the River Marne in its lower part. Another reservoir, two miles high, is to be established at Montsouris, for the high quarters of Paris, near Belleville. The upper story will receive 15,000 cubic metres of water from the River Dhuis, by means of a machine, at a height of 430 ft. above the level of the Seine. The lower story will receive 25,000 cubic yards of water from the Marne. The Commissioners of Sewers and Public Works, in the sitting elected M. Paul Janet a member of the Academy in the section of moral science, in the room of M. Rossi, deceased. The Royal Society of London, correspondent in the same section, in the place of the late Archbishop Whately. The Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres was also elected.

The Imperial Court of Paris last week decided a curious case arising from the will of the late Lord Henry Seymour. By the will, all the "bigoes" were left to a lady. The testator's executors declared the articles of vertu—pictures, statuary, vases, racing-cups, &c.—to belong to the deceased, and sold them. The executors had sold for some £1200. The Court, however, held that articles of vertu in the eye of the law which could not be worn as an ornament, and Madame got a verdict for £600 and costs.

One of the most famous historical chateaux of France is announced for sale—Vincennes. It is the property of the Orleans family, and came nately to Diana de Poitiers, Catherine de Medicis, and Mary Stuart.

The Abbé Gaume has published a pamphlet denouncing the further defeat of Jansist bands. General Baraine considers that the pacification which was one of the conditions insisted on by the Archbishop Darboy before he would consent to the ordination to deliver to the Archduke Maximilian the vote of the municipalities conferring on him the crown of Mexico, have arrived in Paris.

SPAIN.

The Queen was delivered of a daughter yesterday week. Her Majesty and the Royal infant are in good health. The Infanta, as her baptism on Sunday, will receive the name of Maria Isabella Francisca Margarita, &c., the number of names being, according to the Mexican superstition, unlucky.

The Budget has been presented to Congress. It estimates the revenue at 440,000,000 reals, and the expenditure at 439,000,000. The extraordinary Budget amounts to 160 millions.

A Madrid paper brought by the Peninsular and 35,000 men.

We have to record the recent death of one of the foremost writers of Spain—Ventura de la Vega. His fame is a light literature, but his chief field was the drama. His comedy, "The Man of the World," earned for him the distinction of membership of the Royal Academy of Madrid.

Advices received at Madrid from St. Domingo represent the insurgents to be much discouraged. Fresh reinforcements were constantly arriving.

PORTUGAL.

The infant Prince, Don Carlos, has been solemnly recognised as the successor to the Crown in a special Session of the Cortes. A levy was subsequently held at the palace, and Lisbon was illuminated.

ITALY.

The King stayed some days during the Carnival at Milan, where there was a round of festivities. He has returned to Turin.

The Government continues to make great preparations of a warlike character. The Minister of the Interior has issued orders to his Prefects to push forward the armament of the National Guards, and great quantities of military stores continue to be forwarded to Ancona and Bologna.

The Parliament has resumed its sittings, and commenced the discussion of the bill relative to the taxes on landed property.

AUSTRIA.

The Emperor closed the Session of the Reichsrath in person on Monday. In his speech he took a rose-coloured view of affairs. The Session has not, he says, been remarkable, but it has produced some good work. He has endeavoured to maintain peace, and, indeed, he is convinced that the Austrian Empire is in no danger of peace in the council of nations. His "friendly relations with all the great Powers of Europe" afford a guarantee of the continuance of that peace. The Emperor confidently hopes that what he has done in regard to Holstein will be approved. The Austrian will ensure a happy future to the countries whose rights have long been violated, and will not endanger the tranquillity of Europe, or even extended sphere. Finally, there is a glowing allusion to the strength with which, in spite of the severe pecuniary sacrifices, the army has been created.

The new lottery loan of 200,000,000 florins was negotiated on Thursday week at 96 per cent. The Austrian Credit Mobilier takes 15 millions, Messrs. Rothschild 12 millions, and Baron Sina 10 millions. All the other competitors for the loan joined these capitalists. Some time ago the loan was said to be taken by a syndicate, both by foreign and home capitalists.

The Provincial Diet, which with the exception of Hungary, Croatia, Transylvania, and Venetia, have been convoked for the 2nd of March. On occasion of the present anniversary of the Diet in Poland, the Galician Diet is among the number which have not been convoked.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

The news from the seat of war, which arrives but slowly and is not very definite, leads to the impression that the allies are preparing for a regular siege of the position at Düppel, where, up to the end of last week, the main body of the Danish army lies intrenched. Accounts received in Hamburg state that the Danes are having much to suffer during sallies from their intrenchments at Düppel upon the Prussians, and how fierce these sallies are. Some states that the 1st Regiment of Danish Foot was almost destroyed; but another despatch says that the date, and that the same town, describes the Danes as having twice inflicted heavy damage upon the Prussians. A Hamburg letter, however, states that the allies are preparing for a grand attack upon the Danish intrenchments on the 18th inst. Meanwhile, in the first instance, to bring up all the heavy artillery required from Prussia. The latter is to be brought from Stettin and Pillau to operate against the Danish fleet. In fact, the first division of the Prussian steam-fleet has been declared ready for sea, and will proceed to the Danish waters in the Baltic. Marshal Wrangel is said to have collected a great number of the Danish lands for the purpose of effecting a landing in Alsen. The Crown Prince of Prussia is to command the force destined for the attack on Alsen.

The Danish cavalry, which parted from the main body of the army when the Danes retreated to the position of Düppel, is reported to have safely entered Alsen.

The Austrian troops seem to have advanced further to the north in Schleswig than the Prussian troops. They do not, and a telegram asserts that there are "indications" of the allies' intention to enter Jutland, though we are not aware what these indications may be.

The Austro-Prussian armies in Schleswig are receiving reinforcements. The Austrian troops are to strengthen their left wing in Alsen. Fresh bodies of Prussians continue to arrive in Hamburg, and orange-tents have been erected in the vicinity in consequence of 3600 Austrians by railway.

The official paper of Copenhagen states that no armistice involving the evacuation of the mainland of Schleswig will be accepted by the Danish Government. The Dagbled goes a step further, and asserts that unless the entire duchy of Schleswig and a sufficient indemnity the Government of the King there no proposal for an armistice would be listened to by the Danish Government. However, that no proposal for armistice has been received by the Danish Government.

The Danish Government has sent an official notification to the Secretary of the Prussian Legation at Copenhagen that orders have been issued to the Danish cruisers to capture Prussian merchantmen.

King Christian has issued the following proclamation to the army:—

Soldiers!—Not alone by valour on the battle-field, but also by steadfast obedience and discipline in camp and quarters, and privations and hardships, the soldier has to prove his fidelity to his King and his love for his country. There are two strong pos who have proved their faith against a superior enemy, for that you have not degenerated since Frederick and Isted. You have all had ample opportunity to show that you are worthy successors of your forefathers, and you have preserved a cheerful courage under long and severe hardships.

Soldiers! I am proud of the confidence of your King. The Hammerhek has not abandoned. The guns which were to have carried the severance of that enemy are in the hands of the Danish army. Soldiers! I am sure I deeply feel that I am not mistaken. Soldiers! I am sure that I have not misjudged the army for the defence of the country, and your military leaders were right when that I would not be disappointed in you if I did not believe you; they therefore came to the determination to retreat.

Soldiers! I am convinced that the world will say you were right. Up to the present time no Power has declared that it will support us by arms. But I depend upon you and my brave army to stand by and your hand, but we are for against many, and safety must therefore be dearly purchased.

May the difficulties which we have to encounter soon strike for all the violence and injustice which has been done to us and my people!

The speech of the Crown Prince of Prussia a few days back to the Upper House of the Rigsdag, is one of determined and unyielding hostility to the Danish Government. The determination to fight to the army is precisely similar in its tone.

The Danish Government has appointed a new Governor-in-Chief of the military operations in Schleswig while the army was under his orders. In this division of command it is understood that he ordered Gerlach to be evacuated because he had not sufficient men to defend the Schlei, which runs between Gerlach and the sea, might be crossed at three different points. The General adds that events justified the measure he had adopted, as if the Danish army had not had a start of fourteen hours, it would have been cut off by the Prussian corps, which crossed the Schlei at Arnis. General De Meza concludes by declaring that the responsibility for the loss of the Danish battalion history will render him justice. A letter from Copenhagen states that General De Meza will not bear the responsibility, he shirking from the command in chief of the Danish troops. His report has been well received both by the Government and the public generally.

Meanwhile, the difficulties between Austria and Prussia and the German Diet are daily growing more and more complicated. Notices have been laid before the Diet against the conduct of the two great Powers in entering Holstein, and their proceedings in that country have already formally occupied by the federal troops. The four kingdoms, Bavaria, Saxony, Hanover, and Wirtemberg, have opened a conference at Wurzburg for the purpose of forming a league of peace against the possibility of Austria and Prussia handing back Schleswig to Denmark on some future occasion. It is believed that the two great Powers of Germany have already a plan in preparation for restoring Holstein to the Government of the Duke, and that union became henceforth merely personal, and that the eventual claims of the Augustenburgs, in which we have failure in the succession, be recognised.

The Austrian Civil Commissioner has just delivered a speech at Flensburg, in which he made an important declaration. He stated that, while the Austrian troops remain in Schleswig, it would be for as possible be satisfied, a personal union of the duchies with Denmark could not be entertained.

The occupation of Altona by the Prussian troops has given great dissatisfaction to the Danish residents. In the sitting of the Federal Diet on Saturday various protests were handed in against the proceedings of the Prussian troops, the Saxon Minister especially complaining that they were in direct contradiction to the express agreement of Austria and Prussia.

The Lower House of the Reuss-Darmstadt Parliament urges on the Government to press for a settlement in the Diet on the Schleswig-Holstein question. In any case, it requires Duke Frederick of Augustenburg to be recognised, and further desires that the Diet should send troops to occupy Schleswig in common with Austria and Prussia.

Adjutant-General Mantenffel has arrived at Dresden to make arrangements with the Saxon Government as to the position of the Saxon and Prussian troops in Holstein. Meanwhile, the Federal Com-misioners in Holstein have offered to resign if they have lost the confidence of the Diet.

The semi-official journal of Stockholm has declared that the Swedish Cabinet does not support the proposal for an armistice between the Austro-Prussians and the Danes, and has not recommended the King of Denmark to withdraw the November Constitution.

RUSSIA.

The baptism of the young Prince, son of the Grand Duke Nicholas of Russia, has just taken place at the Winter Palace at St. Petersburg, the name given being Alexis. The godfathers were the Emperor, the Grand Duke Constantine, the Grand Duke Nicholas, brother of the newly born Prince, and Prince Peter of Oldenburg. The godmothers were the Queen Dowager of Holland and the Grand Duchesses Helen, Maria, and Olga.

AMERICA.

The Confederates appear to have made a general aggressive movement. General Longstreet has, it is reported, left the Federals near Knoxville and got possession of the French Broad River, whence large supplies of provisions can be drawn. General Lee has been driven in the Federal outposts, and in Western Virginia had captured two pieces of artillery and destroyed the tunnel, but, on general advantage, they were replaced in both instances.

The Federals have recommenced building Fort Sumter, having discovered that the Confederates had remounted five guns on the fort.

There was a renewed report of General Meade being superseded by General Hooker.

Another land and naval expedition was being fitted out at New Orleans; its destination was not known, but was supposed to be Mobile.

The Southern army is said to be in the best spirits, and the soldiers were re-enlisting by brigades and companies. General Lee issued an order on the 22nd ult. stating that the temporary reduction of rations was caused by circumstances over which the control of their country had with the support of the army; but it was hoped this would be of short duration. The army has perfect confidence in its commander, and no sacrifice too great for its patriotism.

President Lincoln has issued a forced levy of 500,000 men. The levy is to be made on the 10th of March next, and all volunteers who may be raised before that date will be deducted from the levy. Those who have enrolled in October last are to be included in the 500,000 required by the present call, which is therefore an order for an additional levy of 500,000 men.

A bill has been reported in the House of Representatives appropriating $10,000,000 for the use of the Government during the month of June, 1865.

The New York legislature has resolved to add 2,000,000 dols. to the recruiting fund, and to increase the State bounty to 300 dols.

A New York letter says that since the issue of the new gold war President Lincoln has called out about 2,000,000 men for service in the Federal army, and 500,000 for service in the Federal navy.

Quite an excitement exists in relation to the next presidency. Mr. Lincoln has been nominated by the Union Republican legislature with convention, and it is believed that he will get the regular Republican nomination, although Mr. Chase's friends are advancing his claims with considerable energy. Mr. Seward is also spoken of as a candidate. The nomination of General Grant has been strongly advocated by the New York Herald and several other papers, but Mr. Lincoln, it is said, seems to be the probable candidate of the Democratic party.

General Quirk's paper factory in Richmond, Virginia, has been destroyed by fire: 1700 workmen were thrown out of employment, and the loss is estimated at several millions of dollars. The buildings in which munitions are made were saved.

The Chief of Washington has issued a Court of Inquiry to investigate the circumstances under which an officer of the Federal steamer Underwriter, Mr. Gray, was arrested by the officers of the Confederate steamer Nashville, and taken in British waters. According to the published statements of the correspondence and the statements of the English crew, an unprovoked murder was committed by Doniphan, the Federal officer. The Boston Herald says that the evidence already declares the fatal shot was fired accidentally by him.

The Army of the Potomac under Meade has decided to restore the Chesapeake and cargo to the owners, subject to conditions respecting the payment of certain expenses to the Federal Government, &c. The Attorney-General demands a surety against latent claims, but the owners of the Chesapeake object to this.

The hearing of the case of the men implicated in the seizure of the Chesapeake was still going on at New York. On Wednesday, the testimony was given to the effect that ten of the men who seized the ship were commissioned Confederate officers.

NOVA SCOTIA.

The Legislature was opened on the 4th inst. by the Governor in person. In his speech the Governor congratulated the Legislature upon the satisfactory state of the finances.

I gladly avail myself of this opportunity of congratulating you and the people whom you represent upon the signal success which has attended the efforts made to place this province in a creditable condition in connection with the International Exhibition. The Royal Commissioners and the executive body of the province have received the thanks of the Imperial Government for the remarkable progress made in acquiring a knowledge of military movements, although the limited appropriation available did not fully appreciate the advantages of British connection, and is both willing and able to raise an effective force in the event of a serious emergency arising over it. I have no reason to doubt that you will make such provision for this important branch of the public service as will enable your Majesty's Government to assure you that prominent position among the British American provinces which in this respect they now occupy.

The importance of consolidating the influence and advancing the commercial interests of the British American provinces has long been deeply and practically identified with your Majesty's throne and person, and I am desirous to propose to submit for your consideration a proposition, in which the co-operation of the Governor-General of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island will be invited, with a view to the union of the three provinces under one Government.

The excitement in Nova Scotia concerning the gold discoveries is increasing.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The Tuscaloosa, a vessel taken by the Alabama and converted into a Confederate cruiser, has been seized by Admiral Wilkes, by orders from the House Government. The Tuscaloosa has not been fortunate in her cruising, and put into Cape Town in a leaky state. She was there seized, and her former owners are told that she will be restored until they can make out their case in law.

The Duke of Newcastle's reply to the petition of the inhabitants of Cape Town on the subject of additional fortifications for the colony had been made public. It approves of the Governor assembling the next Parliament in Graham's Town, and the colonists were making preparations for securing a full representation during the whole of the Session.

AUSTRALIA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

MELBOURNE, Dec. 26, 1863.

This city and neighbourhood have been visited by storms and floods which, for severity and disastrous results, have never been equalled since the foundation of the colony. Two years ago the devastation was great, but when we intend to give some Engravings of the flood from photographs forwarded by our correspondent.

In political affairs the month has been a blank. Parliament has been further prorogued till the 2nd January. We have no hopes for the dispatch of business.

Mr. Howard Willcox, the founder of the acclimatisation cause in this colony, has returned, after a two years' absence in Great Britain, during which time he has been very successful in establishing branches in other Victorian interests in England and on the Continent. He made a handsome statement at a meeting of the council of the Acclimatisation Society the other day, in the course of which he informed the meeting of the great interest taken in the cause by Miss Burdett Coutts and other wealthy people in London. The statement that Miss Burdett Coutts had undertaken to acclimatise the nightingale here was received with much satisfaction; and it may be equally pleasing to this noble-minded and liberal lady to know that in Victoria her name will in future be associated with that of the nightingale.

Yesterday was Christmas Day; and, so far as weather was concerned, a more delightful day could not have been desired. As a consequence, the town was all but deserted, every one whose circumstances permitted having gone out into the country.

The cricketers have arrived out, and are being lionised at Melbourne. They have been practising on various grounds, and their play is the theme of general commendation. The first match, against twenty-two of Victoria, will take place on the 1st, 2nd, 4th, and 5th of January, on the Melbourne Club ground, and is looked forward to among all classes as the great event.

The Melbourne Argus of Dec. 19 states that "the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS now gives the English public more information about the Australian colonies than any other English paper. It has its own correspondent, and it continually gives excellent illustrations of colonial, local, and general interest."

NEW SOUTH WALES.

Bushranging during the month does not been so prevalent as formerly, although several desperate cases of "sticking up" have occurred.

Mr. and Mrs. Kean are attracting as large audiences as they did in Melbourne.

The financial affairs of this colony are in a sad state. Mr. Riley, in introducing his Budget on the 2nd ult., showed a deficit of £334,000 at the end of 1863, and £1,000,000 of Government debentures at 5 and 10 per cent, stamp-taxes, &c., were proposed. So strong was the feeling against them that Mr. Riley withdrew the bill, declaring that, after a discussion extending over nine or ten nights, the new scheme was withdrawn. He was convinced that they would resign, but the expectation has not been realised. Three months' leave of absence has been granted the Governor, and he has gone to Home. Parliament has adjourned till Tuesday. It is not expected that there will be a dissolution.

QUEENSLAND.

Government have contracted upon building new Houses of Parliament. Designs are advertised for; £1,000 are offered for the best, and £100 for the second best.

Arrangements are being made for taking the census.

Wool is coming down freely from the interior, and trade, generally, is improving.

NEW ZEALAND.

A supplement to the London Gazette was issued on Saturday afternoon, containing three despatches from Commodore Sir William Wiseman, respecting the conduct of the men and officers under his command in the late attack on Gate Pah. In the first despatch, a list of the commendations there bestowed on the officers, the Lords of the Admiralty have also been pleased to confer the rank of Lieutenants Davies and Alexander to be Commanders, and they honourably mention Lieutenant Hay, of the Harrier.

The Parliament of New Zealand have voted £2000 for the orphans and widows of the men killed at Gate Pah.

By the last advices from New Zealand we learn that the land belonging to the natives who have been in arms for the last two or three eight million acres are already considered to have been forfeited. The Government are pressing on the war with advantage on one way by establishing upon it 20,000 military settlers. Every native, moreover, who comes in of his own accord and loyally submits to the laws is acknowledged to be the owner of his land as a crown grant land. The military settlers will each receive fifty acres of good land and an allowance of rations for a year, and a small remuneration pay. The rest of the land will be sold to defray the cost of the war.

We regret to announce that Lieutenant Hunt, whose sketches just received, of the war in New Zealand.

JAPAN.

On the 11th of December Prince Satsuma sent the 100,000 dols. demanded as indemnity for the murder of Mr. Richardson to the British Legation at Yokohama. The Tycoon's share of the indemnity was also signed. The Tycoon's Government have since addressed a handsome congratulatory letter to the British Minister stating their gladness and sincere satisfaction that matters had been so far settled between Great Britain and Japan, and expressing a hope that this mighty cause for fear will be removed from between the two countries.

An Engraving showing Satsuma's Envoys counting the indemnity money in the office of the British Legation at Yokohama, from a sketch by our Artist, Mr. C. Wirgman, will appear in the I.L.N. on the subject, appears on page 189; and on the same page is given a portrait of Mr. Heusken, from a photograph by M. Beato, forwarded by our Special Artist at Yokohama.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1864.

We felt it a duty incumbent upon us to notice, in our last week's Number, the references made in the Kagosima debate to this Journal. We then pointed out that we had, in justice both to ourselves and to Mr. Wirgman, our Artist in Japan, laid the proofs of the authenticity of the information we gave as to the bombardment of Kagosima before Mr. Buxton and Mr. Layard. We produced to them the original sketch and article, with other papers, in proof that "a picture of a town in South America had, as Mr. Layard suggested," been furbished up to represent a town in Japan."

We this week engrave another sketch and publish another letter from the same Artist, in which our readers will find further information upon the subject. A reference to the Parliamentary debate will show that the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has taken an opportunity frankly to acknowledge his place in the list of those who contributed to error into which he had fallen, in the midst of the debate, in doubting the pictorial and other information set forth in these pages.

SHAKSPEARE—we are not going to write about the proposal which has at length come forth for erecting a memorial in the form of "a statue with colonnades" in the Green Park, but it is de rigueur this year to begin everything with Shakspeare—the Bard of Avon, then, makes two of the soldiers in "Antony and Cleopatra" speak to this effect:—"We go hence to-night." "Then we kill all the women." "We go hence to-night." "No matter of necessity," responds the disciplinarian, "let women die." The House of Commons may have been reminded of this dialogue, at least of its spirit, on the conclusion of the debate on the private business question, which extended public business for a whole evening early in the week.

The House of Commons—that is to say, the large portion of the body which cannot claim sexagenarian privileges of exemption—is fortunately complaining, the Times tells us, of the enormous quantity of work which it is compelled to do. We are not speaking of the public debates. Nobody is actually compelled to attend these, except a few persons who have constituted themselves into a vigilance committee to watch the men whom they hope to succeed. The whips have certainly a strong moral control over party members, and have a magnetic-like power of dragging them from the dining-table, from the mazes "where Science marshals forth her own quadrille," from the demi-jour of the opera-box, and even from short whist. But not even Mr. Brand can punish as defaulter otherwise than by hinting that he has learned the otherwise absolute certainty of being made an Under-Secretary on the very next change. When uninteresting and unimportant matters—say the welfare of the empire of India or the rights of the fifty colonies—are under discussion, the smallest number of members requisite to form a House is usually in attendance, and we see how very free our senators are to act as they like. Now, when the whole House, body, there is no tyrannous demand of attention from the mind, and the reporters can testify to the facilities afforded by the long and comfortable benches of the side galleries for obtaining necessary repose. The Constitution is left to take care of itself, and does so in a highly satisfactory manner, just as the above-named poet has hitherto done. The worn-out members have no right to complain that the public is a hard master. It is true that some unauthorised association keeps a sort of work-book, and checks the attendance of gentlemen; but this is rather regarded as an impertinence over by the party with which the society is connected, and it gives the majority of members no sort of concern. We do not know that we could wish things otherwise. It is true that, theoretically, a member of Parliament knows everything, and is qualified to speak and vote upon everything; but common-sense tempers theory in this sensible country, and men abstain to a great extent from taking part in business which they do not understand. Were the debates all that Parliament means, an able-bodied member would be a Sybarite did he murmur.

But the private business of the House is another matter. That is hard work. It cannot be escaped, and must be attended to in earnest. Gentlemen have to submit to go and be shut up in a committee-room, to listen with all their might while counsel, whose interest is in protracting the performance, bestow all their tediousness upon them, and while witnesses, of every grade of stupidity or cunning, voluntarily or involuntarily conceal or garble the facts of the case. Such work is really uninteresting, except to those who are concerned and those who are hired to be concerned, and the mode in which it is treated is most bewildering. But members must attend these Committees, until the happy statute-holidays arrive to the rescue, and enables them to claim exemption. From twelve o'clock until the Speaker is announced to be at prayers is the regular time, and the work may be almost indefinitely protracted. This is a real and substantial grievance. Nobody is to blame. We have a proposition the other night to add another hour to the work, and Lord Robert Cecil justly observed that such an idea was "inhuman," and the House felt with him.

Without entering at present into Mr. Milner Gibson's propositions in reference to private bills, inasmuch as his object—a laudable one—is to save the House from its own powers, we should very much like to know whence arises the instinctive objection of the House to the establishment of a separate tribunal of skilled judges, who should take all private measures under their consideration, and report to the Commons. It is unconstitutional, no doubt; but so are Committees themselves, which have, nevertheless, been rendered absolutely necessary. As to the House not being able to delegate its powers, that is of course absurd. House delegates its powers whenever it asks for a Commission. Does the House think that the public is so in love with Parliamentary Committees that it will not be glad to see them abolished? Does it want to be disabused of such an idea. The public resorts to the Committees because it must, and would infinitely sooner have its schemes tested before a regular and responsible tribunal, where the rules of evidence are somewhat respected, where lawyers would not be allowed to talk against time, and where fencing witnesses would speedily be transferred from the box to the dock. The public is not tremulous on the subject. It is not afraid to trust the House to part with a shred of the power which properly belongs to it. We should not propose that the Private Bill Court (it is in the future now, but some day this clamant evil will be given an hearing of it) should exercise final judgment. It will be only a Committee, but it will do its work rationally, rapidly, and on system; and its reports will, in most cases, be so convincing that the House will come to resolutely, alludes in the quotation with which we commenced, and we need no longer say, "On a matter of necessity, let members die." However, the question is in their own hands. The public would rejoice in the institution of a Court which would relieve it and if the Commons will not hear of it, let us not hear of their sufferings in the interest of railways, canals, and embankments. Ta tau soulu, Georges Dandin.

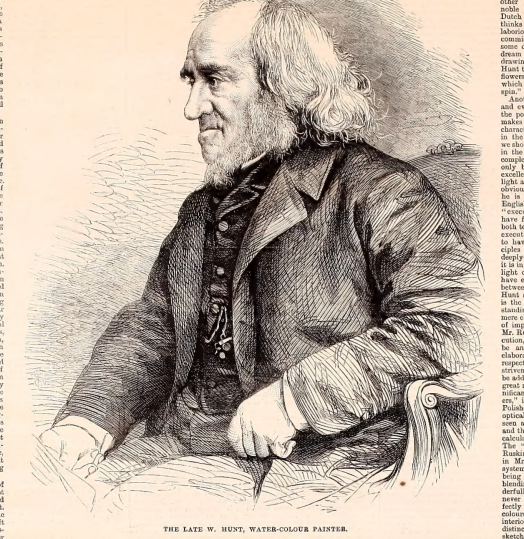
THE WAR IN SCHLESWIG: AUSTRIAN CAMP IN FRONT OF THE DANNEWERK: THE 18TH BATTALION OF BOHEMIAN CHASSEURS IN A SNOWSTORM.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.



WILLIAM H. HUNT.

By the death, on the 10th inst., of William Henry Hunt, at the goodly age of seventy-four, the (Old) Society of Painters in Water Colours, and, let us hasten to add, the whole English school of painting and a large section of the public, sustains the loss of an artist of great originality, and some of whose powers were, we firmly believe, unparalleled. It is a bold thing for us to claim unique excellence for any artist of our own day; yet we hazard the assertion that, within certain limits of comparison and in respect to a few special qualities, William Hunt is the facile princeps of all known painters of still-life.

Imitation to the point of illusion has always excited popular admiration more than any other property or accident of art. And this illusive imitation has always been most easily and naturally exhibited in pictorial copies of immobile objects, which are hence rather absurdly classed as still-life. A large proportion of the stories of ancient Greek painting which have descended to our time had their origin in the deception of the senses. The painting of still-life, under the names of hypæparaphy, was, among the later Greeks and Romans, a distinct branch of art, as among us. Such facts indicate that art in nascent times had arrived at considerable technical perfection. Exact and, as far as possible, illusive imitation seems to have been the great aim of the Dutch and Flemish painters of still-life. In this aim they fell—notwithstanding the consummate skilfulness of their handiwork, the truth and beauty of their colouring—into mechanical methods of manipulation. Seghers, Snyders, de Heem, Rachel Ruysch, Weenix, Hondekoeter, Van Huysum, and Van Os, are all more or less superficial, definite, and subjectively limited. The chief exception is Snyders; yet even he is distinguished rather by a largeness and freedom of style and handling, derived from his friend Rubens, than by that rare penetration and magic of suggestiveness which are the attributes of highest art. Here, in these Netherlandish schools, we see that illusive imitation is the concomitant of technical mastery; hence, for one reason, the probability that it indicates the same thing among the ancients.

Now, in the still-life drawings of William Hunt there is, in the first place, the same complete command of the material resources of art. We think we shall offend no one by saying that the deceased has left none behind him so completely master of the materials of water-colour painting. In whatever other qualities he may have transcended him, even Turner has not exemplified the power of colour and form of relief we find in some works by William Hunt. In the next place, Hunt has the negative merit of being—almost, by-the-way, for the first time in the history of still-life art—entirely free from that definite, limited, and assignable finality of the copyist. But the quality which places Hunt's still-life supreme and apart is the (in a sense) positive one of being mysteriously and illimitably suggestive. Every touch is so. All that is artistically beautiful in the object he imitates is, as it were, reduced to its essential component grain, and each grain readjusted on the paper without confusion or loss of identity. It is the very alchemy of art, exemplifying in one and the same instance the opposite processes of analysis and synthesis. He, for the first time in still life painting, unites perfect finish with perfect freedom, and optical illusion, which is a necessary property of comprehensive imitation, with that feeling in selection which is the higher characteristic of artistic representation. We see, in short, the poetic suggestions wedded to the prose facts of art, and set to each other "like perfect music unto noble words." In looking at a Dutch flower-piece one instantly thinks of the painter's patient laboriousness, and often ends by commiserating him for his toilsome drudgery; but we no more dream of effort or labour in a drawing of fruit or flowers by Hunt than we do in gazing at the flowers of the field themselves, which "toil not, neither do they spin."
